Rashīd Riḍā and Maqāṣid al-Sharī‘a

This article attempts to analyze the legal thought of the modern religious reformer Muhammad Rashīd Riḍā (1865-1935), particularly his conception of the legal aims of Islamic law (maqāṣid al-sharī‘a). I argue that Riḍā’s legal thought stems from his understanding of the maqāṣid of the Qur‘ān. The Lawgiver, in Riḍā’s view, wants Muslims, whether jurists or not, to contemplate the ḥikma or the rationale behind any legal rule and to focus on the general principles of the shari‘a, in which the consideration of the public good (maṣlaḥa) becomes a significant part. The article also responds to the view of few Western scholars’ evaluations of Riḍā’s legal thought such as those of Malcolm Kerr and Wael Hallaq.

INTRODUCTION

Maqāṣid is the plural form of maqṣad, a term which refers to intention. In Islamic legal parlance, the plural maqāṣid is used more often than the singular form, maqṣad, to refer to the aims of the shari‘a (Islamic law), the intentions of the Divine Lawgiver (God).¹ There are few aims of the shari‘a that are articulated in their general form in scripture such as the aim of “justice” mentioned in the Qur‘ānic verse (16:90) which reads: “God commands justice, doing of good, and giving to kith and kin, and He forbids all indecent deeds, and evil and rebellion: He instructs you, that you may receive admonition.”² Therefore, one can assume that

². The translation of Qur‘ānic verses in this article is mainly taken from Abdul-after the death of Muhammad in 632 C. E. the early Muslim community, especially the Prophet’s Companions and their Successors, understood through the Qur’anic references to the legal aims that shari’ah laws were always purposeful and intended by the Lawgiver to achieve certain goals. The Qur’anic ban on drinking grape-wine (khamr) and the prohibition of gambling (maysir) (Q. 5:90-91), for example, is followed by the reasoning that both would lead the one engaging in these practices to have quarrels with his or her fellow Muslims and would also lead to forgetting the daily prayers. But despite the clear indication of the legal aims and purposes of some religious laws in the Qur’an, there are other legal stipulations, such as the prohibition of eating pork meat (Q. 2:173), where no clear reference to a legal aim is mentioned. Such verses might lead us to think that the early Muslim community understood the ultimate legal aim of the shari’ah as obedience to the commands of the Lawgiver (God). Whether the purposes and aims of any religious law are mentioned or not, one has to follow the dictates of the Qur’anic legal injunctions. But the expansion of the Islamic state to territories outside the Arabian Peninsula, after the death of the Prophet, had created many new legal cases that were not regulated by the Qur’an or Prophetic traditions. In addition, if the Prophet’s Companions succeeded during the reign of the third caliph, ‘Uthmān b. ‘Affān (d. 35/656), in canonizing the Qur’anic text, the acceptance of Prophetic traditions remained controversial. This situation led the emerging early jurists and judges in different Islamic provinces to develop methods of legal reasoning in order to provide legal rules for new problems.

In the formative period of Islamic legal theory (second-fourth centuries, Hijrī/eighth-tenth centuries, C.E.), however, a controversy emerged among Muslim jurists on the question of legal reasoning. The followers of the Zāhirite school, for example, maintained that the purpose of or the reason for having the divine law could only be realized through the literal application of legal rules in the Qur’an and hadith. Thus the reason for having any law must be attached to its form and cannot be isolated as a guiding principle to be applied in new cases. Thus all shari’ah laws must be applied literally to the cases that are under their direct effect. As for the new legal cases, which are not regulated by the sacred texts of the Qur’an and Prophetic traditions, they should be regarded as outside the realm of religious obligation (khār-ij dāʾirat al-taklīf), and therefore their legal status is “permission.”

The followers of what we now think of as the four established Sunnī schools, Ḥanafīte, Mālikite, Shāfīʿite and Ḥanbalite, agreed in principle on the literal application of textual rules, but they also advocated the use of causes or reasons behind the laws as a method for extending the application of textually regulated legal rules to non-textual cases.
Among the four schools, however, the jurists’ understanding of the applicability of this practice varied to a considerable degree. In general, the Sunnī schools use legal analogy (qiyyāṣ) to extend the effect of a textual legal rule to include non-textual cases by sharing the same cause (ʿilla). A classic example of such analogy is the use of “intoxication” as illa for the prohibition of intoxicating drinks not mentioned in the Qurʿān or Prophetic traditions. Therefore, if drinking grape-wine is prohibited in the Qurʿān, date-wine becomes prohibited by analogy because it shares the same attribute of intoxication with grape-wine.
Zāhīrite and Shiʿite jurists, on the contrary, reject the use of analogy as a legal source.

While the four established Sunnī schools agreed on having four sources of Islamic law, namely, the Qurʿān, hadīth, ijmaʿ (consensus of the religious scholars) and qiyyāṣ, some of them added other methods of legal reasoning and included them as complementary sources of law. Ḥanafīte jurists, for example, used istiḥsān (juristic preference) to rule in some new cases instead of using qiyyāṣ. Mālikite jurists used

3. For the explanation of this Zāhīrite view, see Ibn Ḥazm, al-Iḥkām fī Uṣūl al-
4. Zāhīrite and Shiʿite jurists, for example, argue that the prohibition of drinking date-wine can be established through the sacred texts themselves because there is a well-accepted Prophetic tradition which states clearly that “every intoxicating drink (muskīr) is prohibited.” Thus, there is no need to use analogy. The main argument of Zāhīrite and Shiʿite jurists against the inclusion of qiyyāṣ as a legal source stems from their conviction that the results of legal analogy are probable, and therefore cannot be included within the divine law (sharīʿa). While Zāhīrite jurists approve only three sources of Islamic law, namely, the Qurʾān, hadīth and ijmaʿ, Shiʿite jurists also include ʿaql (reason) which in their interpretation amounts to rational decisions that are based on self-evident truths, and therefore, unlike qiyyāṣ, can provide “certain” knowledge. For a detailed explanation of the role of ʿaql in clascical Shiʿite legal theory, see Muhammad Ḥusayn Mughniyya, ʿIlm Uṣūl al-Fiqh fī
5. For a definition of istiḥsān by a Ḥanafīte jurist, see Abū Saḥl al-Sarakhṣī, alistihsān and istiṣlāḥ (the consideration of a maṣlaḥa mursala, i.e. a benefit or utility unregulated by the texts). Other methods such as sadd al-dharāʾīʿ (closing the means to harm) and the consideration of ūrf (local custom) were also used by some jurists as sources for legal ruling.

As for incorporating the concept of maqāṣid al-sharīʿa into the theoretical formulations of medieval jurists, it is clear that the legal aims were not considered by any school of jurisprudence as a distinguished legal source similar to qiyās, istihsān or maṣlaḥa mursala. However, some medieval jurists expressed a general understanding of the sharīʿa as preserving certain utilities (maṣāliḥ) and preventing harms and injuries (mafāṣid). One of the earliest jurists who engaged in this kind of discourse was Abū Ḥāmid al-Ghazzālī (d. 505/1111). He developed a legal discourse in which the legal aims took a major part. He stated that the sharīʿa aims at preserving religion, life, private property, mind and offspring. These are, for Ghazzālī, the maqāṣid of the sharīʿa. But as a Shāfīʿite jurist, Ghazzālī did not accept as legitimate any legal sources other than the Qurʾān, ḥadīth, ijmāʿ and qiyās. Istiṣlāḥ can be used as a legal source only in extreme cases of necessity. Another medieval jurist, Ibn Qayyim al-Jawziyya (d. 751/1350), reiterated Ghazzālī’s new theorization with an equal emphasis on maqāṣid al-sharīʿa, but despite his Ḥanbalite loyalty, he acknowledged the need to resort to some methods other than qiyās if the use of the latter would not help to achieve the purpose of the law.

The most prominent medieval jurist who incorporated maqāṣid al-sharīʿa in his legal thinking was the Mālikite jurist Abū ʿIshāq al-Shāṭibī (d. 790/1388). He developed in his al-Muṣfaqât fi ʿUṣūl al-

6. In classical legal theory, maṣlaḥa is usually associated with a legal source known as maṣlaḥa mursala (a benefit or utility unregulated by the texts). Some classic examples of the use of this source, according to some Sunnī jurists, are the collection of the Qurʾān by the third caliph after the Prophet, ʿUthmān b. ʿAffān and the institution of Diwān al-Jund to write down the names of the combatants in the Muslim army by the second caliph, ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb. Although such actions were not mentioned in the Qurʾān or instituted by the Prophet, and therefore the utilities or benefits gained from them were not considered in the sacred texts, the caliphs’ decisions apparently indicated a consideration of those “unregulated” utilities.

Rashid Riḍā and Maqāsid al-Shari‘a

Sharī‘a, a coherent maqāsid theory based on Ghazzalī’s conception of maṣlaḥa. All sharī‘i rules, according to Shāṭibi, aim at preserving specific utilities (maṣāliḥ) that can be divided into three types according to their religious significance. These are the indispensable (darūriyyāt), the needed (ḥājiyyāt) and the utilities that achieve improvement (taḥsiniyyāt). Preserving life, for example, is considered by Shāṭibi an indispensable utility, while the abridgment of ritual obligations under circumstances of hardship is considered necessary but not indispensable. For the third type of utilities, the taḥsiniyyāt, Shāṭibi considers performing ablution before prayer and being charitable to the poor as examples of such utilities. Shāṭibi’s aim was to show that in all textually regulated legal cases, whether in the Qur‘ān or Prophetic traditions, the legal rule was instituted based on the priorities of the utilities aimed by the Lawgiver. Thus, in spite of the fact that fasting the month of Ramaḍān, for example, might lead to some hardship, the utility of preserving religious devotion through fasting is, according to Shāṭibi, more significant than the utility of avoiding such hardship.

Shāṭibi’s reference to several levels of utilities that are considered according to their significance in the textually-based rules raises the question whether non-textual legal cases must be subjected to the same method of comparing the significance of different kinds of utilities involved. Shāṭibi focuses in his examples only on textual cases and he does not clearly call for the use of any legal methodology that is different from the traditional Mālikite one, which incorporates maṣlaḥa mursala as a source used only on a limited basis after qiyās. If this is true, then what kind of practical results can the use of this method achieve compared with, for instance, the traditional use of qiyās or maṣlaḥa mursala? These questions lie at the heart of the legal thinking of modern religious reformers.

Following Shāṭibi’s methodology, the maqāsid reformers, such as Riḍā and others, view the sharī‘a as encompassing two major parts. The first part represents the laws that regulate ritual practices (‘ibādāt) and the second part represents the laws that regulate social relations and economic transactions (mu‘āmalāt). The first part has to be fixed. It is not developing, and no new laws are acceptable. This understanding of the fixation of ‘ibādāt resonates in Ibn Taymiyya’s (d. 728/1327) dictum: lā na‘bud Allāh illā bimā shara‘ (we do not worship Allah except through what he has legislated).8 As for the mu‘āmalāt, the reformers define these laws as intended by the Lawgiver to serve the utility and interest (maṣlaḥa) of Muslims in all times and places. Rules that are explicitly stated in the Qurʾān and Prophetic traditions are, by nature, based on the consideration of utility, interest, and the public good. Maṣlaḥa, therefore, is presented by the reformers as one of the greatest legal aims of the shariʿa. Thus, modern Muslim jurists, the reformers argue, should take this fact into consideration when interpreting and applying any legal rule of the shariʿa, whether found in the sacred texts or reached through the legal reasoning of Muslim jurists.

There is a consensus among the modern proponents of the concept of maqāṣid al-shariʿa – coming from their Sunnī Islamic background – that it played a significant role in the legal interpretation of the early Muslim community, especially that of the four “well-guided caliphs” after the Prophet, and the early fuqahāʾ (religious scholars) such as Abū Ḥanīfa (d. 150/767) and Mālik b. Anas (d. 179/796).9 It is also embedded in the classical interpretation of Islamic law, at least as a trend within diverse lines of thought. Modern reformers argue, for example, that the concept of maqāṣid al-shariʿa was very much alive in the legal thinking of several medieval fuqahāʾ such as the Ḥanbalī jurists Ibn Ṭaymīyya (d. 728/1327), Ibn Qayyim al-Jawziyya (d. 751/1350), and Najm al-Dīn al-Ṭūfī (d. 716/1316). Moreover, the emphasis on the role of maqāṣid al-shariʿa culminated in the works of the Mālikite jurist Abū ʿIshāq al-Shāṭibī who devoted a great part of his book al-Muwāfaqāt to this concept.10 These jurists, according to the reformers’ view, always took into consideration the general aims of the shariʿa, especially the consideration of maṣlaḥa, as a main factor in legal rulings, even though they lived in a period characterized by a trend toward literalist interpretation. Many other medieval fuqahāʾ ignored the maqāṣid, preferring a rigid imitation of their school’s legal interpretation. For example, Ibn Qayyim al-Jawziyya’s critique of both the Zāhirites and later Shāfiʿīite methodologies stems from his rejection of the rigidity and misunderstanding of the spirit of Islamic law. The Zāhirites are criticized by Ibn al-Qayyim for their literal application of textual rules to the effect of being inconsistent with the legal aims of the shari'a. The Shafi'iites, argues Ibn al-Qayyim, have used qiyaṣ in many occasions where non-textual cases are different from the textual ones, and therefore they do not require a legal rule based on analogy.\footnote{Ibn Qayyim al-Jawziyya, Al-Muwaqqilin 'an Rabb al-'Alamin, ed. Muhammad Abd al-Hamid (Beirut: al-Matbaa al-'Asriyya, 1987), vol. 1, pp. 15-17.} Thus, according to modern reformers, the concept of maqāsid al-shari'a is rooted in classical legal theory and the practical legal opinions of several medieval jurists.

9. Most modern religious reformers refer to some of ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb’s decisions as examples of a legal understanding based on the consideration of maqāṣid al-shariʿa. One of these decisions was his suspension of the textually regulated punishment for stealing during the "year of famine."

As for Shatibi's writings on the maqāsid, while some contemporary scholars, such as Muhammad Khalid Masud, view them as a response to a rigid literality in applying the shari'a, Wael Hallaq, in contrast, sees this interest of Shatibi in the maqāsid as a call to encourage the literal application of the shari'a due to the arbitrary rulings of some of Shatibi's contemporary fuqahā.'\footnote{See Muhammad Khalid Masud, Islamic Legal Philosophy: A Study of Abu Ishāq Al-Shatibi's Life and Thought (Islamabad: Islamic Research Institute, 1977), p. 35; Wael Hallaq, A History of Islamic Legal Theories: An Introduction to Sunni Usul al-Fiqh (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1997), pp. 162-3.} Moreover, some modern proponents of applying the shari'a might use many classical references to maslaha and maqāsid in general to respond to secular accusations that applying the shari'a would jeopardize Muslim interests today. It is not my aim in this article to check whether the medieval usage of the maqāsid was only a rhetorical one, adopted for apologetic purposes to encourage the literal application of the shari'a, or a possible reference to the legal aims to support their consideration in applying shar'i rules, textual or non-textual. But it is clear that the modern movement for the consideration of maqāsid al-shari'a, represented by Rida and others, has produced some legal opinions that challenge traditionalist ones, even in the field of textual rulings.

An example of the modern consideration of maqāsid al-shari'a in relation to a legal case that is regulated by textual rulings can be demonstrated in the case of the modern abolition of slavery.\footnote{Ibn Qayyim al-Jawziyya, Al-Muwaqqilin 'an Rabb al-'Alamin, ed. Muhammad Abd al-Hamid (Beirut: al-Matbaa al-'Asriyya, 1987), vol. 1, pp. 15-17.} The Muslim community in the early centuries of Islam and up to the modern period practiced slavery. There is no text that prohibits slavery, and in fact the Qur'an and ḥadīth contain some regulations of this practice, which gives an indication that the practice in itself is permitted. But most Muslim scholars today prohibit the practice of slavery. The reasoning behind this prohibition, at least according to the maqāsid thinkers, is that although there are some texts that refer to slavery as permitted, others encourage Muslims to free slaves. Freeing a slave is one of the actions that are dedicated to expiate certain kinds of sins (e.g. Q. 4:92, 5:89, 58:3). Therefore, although there is no text that prohibits slavery, those scholars argue that freeing the slaves is the aim of the Lawgiver. The Qur'an did not prohibit slavery due to the circumstances of the time, but it was only regulated to ensure the humane treatment of slaves and also to encourage freeing them. The modern prohibition is clearly based on the consideration of the intended aim of the Lawgiver, which is to free slaves and establish equality among human beings.

In this example, modern scholars have reached a legal position that is different from the traditional one by reinterpreting the Qur'anic verses related to each case. Some of these verses are given more significance than others by representing the ultimate legal aim of the Lawgiver (maqāsid al-sharī'ah). The legal effect of other verses becomes conditioned to a specific historical period and therefore does not apply today. It is important to notice that without the determination of the presumed legal aim intended by the Lawgiver, as stated in specific Qur'anic verses, other verses cannot be conditioned in their application.

Western Scholarship on Riḍā’s Legal Thought

There are several studies on Riḍā that focus on his intellectual project as representing a new movement of reform initiated by Muhammad `Abduh’s (d. 1905) mentor Jamāl al-Dīn al-Afghānī (d. 1897), vis-à-vis traditionalist thinking. These studies, however, include only a limited treatment of Riḍā’s legal thought. Examples of earlier writings on this subject include Charles C. Adams’ Islam and Modernism in Egypt (1933), H. A. R. Gibb’s Modern Trends in Islam (1947) and J. Jomier’s Le Commentaire coranique du Manar (1954).

Other studies in the West of the legal thought of Riḍā, which relate directly to the role of legal aims, have been undertaken by Malcolm Kerr, Albert Hourani and Wael Hallaq. Malcolm Kerr in his book, Islamic Reform: The Political and Legal Theories of Muhammad 'Abduh and Rashid Riḍā, argues that the legal thought of both 'Abduh and Riḍā, which concerns itself with concepts of utility, need and necessity, is influenced by the Western understanding of “natural law” and “utilitarianism”. For 'Abduh, argues Kerr, “natural law is the moral code prescribed by the sharī'a and by sound human faculties.”15 “Rashīd Riḍā's theories of jurisprudence,” observes Kerr, “generally follow logically from Muhammad 'Abduh's concept of the identity of natural law with the sharī'a. He adopted this concept as his own and built upon it a liberal method of legal reasoning, in which the guiding principle was maṣlaḥa.”16 “The entire structure of substantive law arising from the general textual foundations is dictated [in Riḍā's thought] by human need, whether under the name of public interest or necessity. This equation of interest and necessity, put forth in such a manner as to make formal deductions from the revealed sources [i.e. through qiyās] only a secondary confirmation of what the law should be, amounts to an affirmation of natural law.”17

Kerr's conclusions about the legal thought of 'Abduh and Riḍā were adopted by both Albert Hourani and Wael Hallaq, but each took a different path in relating 'Abduh and Riḍā's legal thinking to classical Sunnī legal theory. Hourani, in his Arabic Thought in the Liberal Age, observes that in 'Abduh and Riḍā's legal thought, the concentration on the role of utility and the public interest in legal interpretation has its roots in classical legal theory and the juristic thinking of medieval Sunnī jurists, especially Ibn Taymiyya and Ibn Qayyim al-Jawziyya.18 However, 'Abduh and Riḍā, observes Hourani, go beyond their medieval masters, “at least by making explicit what was half-hidden in their writings.” 19

In contrast to Hourani's conclusion, Hallaq, in his A History of Islamic Legal Theories, claims that the modern emphasis on the role of maslaḥa, espoused by ‘Abduh, Riḍā and others, is a new development not articulated by traditional jurists, including Shāṭibī. Only Ṭūfī might be a possible representative of modern reformers’ view.²⁰ Classical Islamic legal theory, according to Hallaq, insists on the literal application of legal rules found in the sacred texts. Consequently, the concept of maslaḥa, as the most significant legal aim of the shari’ā, has limited application as a legal source, and was used only in non-textual cases by some of the Sunnī schools of jurisprudence. According to this understanding, a legal rule, approved by the Qur’ān or ḥadīth, has to be applied regardless of the benefit or interest gained or lost from this application. The maslaḥa can only be achieved through the literal application of a textual rule. This literal application represents the aim and intention of the Lawgiver. On the contrary, modern religious reformers’ understanding and interpretation of Islamic law, according to Hallaq, are completely based on the notions of utility, public interest, and necessity, a utilitarian approach that runs against the classical understanding of Islamic law. Moreover, in order to achieve this utilitarian interpretation, religious reformers reshaped and molded classical Islamic legal theory to support their view, making the law “nominally Islamic and dominantly utilitarian.”²¹ In addition, “religious utilitarianists-Riḍā, Khallāf and others-”, insists Hallaq, “pay no more than lip service to Islamic legal values; for their ultimate frame of reference remains confined to the concepts of interest, need and necessity. The revealed texts become, in the final analysis, subservient to the imperatives of these concepts.”²²

As stated above, it is clear that Kerr, Hourani and Hallaq deal with the legal aims in Riḍā’s thought through the study of maslaḥa alone. It is my intention to demonstrate that the legal thought of Riḍā can better be understood if maslaḥa is treated as a component of the concept of maqāṣid al-shari'ā. The legal aims, or the maqāṣid, include the consideration of maṣlaḥa but they are not limited by it. Also, viewing Ridā’s project of reform as based on the consideration of maqāṣid al-shari'ā would clarify its dialectic relationship with the sacred texts, while looking at it from only the angle of maṣlaḥa, an extra-textual source, would free this project from the grip of textual evidence and make it appear, as Hallaq concludes, totally independent from the dictates of Qur’ānic verses and Prophetic traditions. This methodological position necessitates treating Ridā’s legal thought through the concept of maqāṣid al-shari'ā and not merely the maṣlaḥa.

²⁰. Najm al-Dīn al-Ṭūfī, in his treatise on a Prophetic tradition, regarded utility (maslaḥa) as the primary source of legislation. For him, even the application of textual rulings must follow the consideration of utility and the public good. His view, however, faced rejection from other medieval jurists because classical legal theory assigned the primacy to the sacred texts and their literal application. All other sources, such as the maslaḥa must follow textual evidence. Al-Ṭūfī’s treatise was published in Muṣṭafā, Zayd, al-Maslaha fi al-Tashri‘ al-Islāmī (Cairo: Dār al-Fikr al-Arabi, 1964).

RIDĀ’S LIFE AND CONTRIBUTION

Muḥammad Rashid Ridā was born in 1865 in the Syrian village of Qalamūn near Tripoli, where he spent most of his childhood years. He started his elementary education in a public school in Tripoli, in which teaching was offered in the Turkish language. Then he registered in an Arabic school, al-Waṭaniyya al-Islamiyya, established by the well-known religious scholar Ḥusayn al-Jisr (d. 1909). Ridā recalls in one of his articles that he studied in this school, among other things, Gazzālī’s Iḥyā, to which he constantly refers in his later writings. In 1884, after Afghani and ‘Abduh published their magazine, al-Urwa al-Wuthqā, in Paris, Ridā was able to read its first issues when he found them in al-Jisr’s library. Ridā writes later in Manār that “after reading al-Urwa al-Wuthqā, I discovered a new way of understanding Islam and that it is not only a religion of spiritual guidance but also a complete way of life.”24 He also read, during those years of his education under the guidance of al-Jisr, the magazine al-Muqtataf, which focused on the latest developments in science. In 1896, Ridā got his license as a teacher graduating with the degree of ḍīlīm (religious scholar) from the Waṭaniyya school. After his graduation, he first tried to contact Afghani to study with him, but after his failure to do so, he decided to travel to Egypt to meet 'Abduh. He arrived in Egypt in January 1898. After meeting 'Abduh, Riḍā suggested to him to publish a magazine that advocates Afghani and 'Abduh's reformist ideas. 'Abduh agreed to the suggestion, naming the magazine al-Manār (The Sign Post). In the same year, 1898, the first issue of Manār was published. Riḍā writes later that when Manār appeared in circulation, it followed the reformist line of al-ʿUrwa al-Wuthqā except for the latter's anti-British tone. He also adds that he accepted 'Abduh's suggestion to soften the Manār's political voice against the Ottoman Sultan 'Abd al-Hamid, aiming at having a more consultative system of government.

From 1898–1908, Riḍā stayed in Egypt, but after 'Abd al-Hamid was deposed in 1909, he traveled to Istanbul, Turkey. During his visit to Istanbul, he met with representatives of the political organization that ruled Turkey, al-İttihat wa'l-Taraqqi. Moreover, he met with Shaykh al-Islam and discussed with him the possibility of establishing a new religious school in Egypt in which Riḍā would teach the students according to his reformist line of thought. Later in the same year, 1909, an Ottoman administrative order was issued to form an organization called Jamʿīyyat al-ʿIlm waʾl-Irshād, but Riḍā did not like, according to his account in Manār, its administrative structure which made the school under the supervision of Shaykh al-Islam and affiliated with the Ottoman educational system. But his objection was not taken into consideration by Ottoman authorities. He later traveled to India, and after his return to Egypt he established an organization and school called Jamʿīyyat al-Daʿwa waʾl-Irshād. It opened its doors to students in 1912. Riḍā worked for three years as the principal of the school, but because World War One had started and the school could not get any more funding from the Egyptian government, it closed in 1916. Riḍā narrates in Manār that while he was before the War very much against any attempt to abolish the Ottoman Empire, based on his pan-Islamic conviction inherited from Afghani and 'Abduh, he nevertheless found that after the War he believed that the best for the Arabs is to get full independence, whether from the Turkish authorities or the occupying Europeans.29 He mentions that he and other Syrian dignitaries had sent a letter to the president of the United States asking him to help the Syrians to get their independence from France. He also supported Sharif Husayn, the Amir of Mecca, in the latter’s revolt against Ottoman authorities. Later, and until his death in 1935, Riḍā supported King Abd al-Aziz, the founder of modern Saʿudi Arabia.

RIḌĀ AND MAQĀṢID AL-SHARĪʿA

Riḍā is clearly interested in the concept of maqāṣid al-sharīʿa. In several places of his writings, he refers to the maqāṣid and envisions Islam as aiming to achieve certain goals and purposes. In his fatwā, known as the “fatwā on the Parisian questions,” he replies to the question on the definition of ijtiḥād and the requirements of the mujtahid. After quoting from Tahānawi’s (ca. 1158/1745) Kashshāf and Mārghinānī’s (d. 593/1197) Ḥidāya and a reference to Shāṭibī, Riḍā states that ijtiḥād, according to medieval jurists, is « contemplating the legal sources, which are the Qurʾān, sunna, ijmāʿ, and qiyās, and to know the detailed rules that are not found in the “certain” sources. The main requirement of a mujtahid is to be able to understand the Qurʾān and sunna, to know maqāṣid al-sharīʿa, and to realize peoples’ life situations and customs. This is because the rules of the sharīʿa, especially in muʿāmalāt, depend on achieving what is good for the people in this life and in the hereafter on the basis of the principle “preventing harm and bringing benefit.” » 30

Riḍā notes that after his answers to the Parisian questions were published in Manār, ‘Abduh told him that what he wrote was the best at explaining the principles of Islam and its maqāṣid.31 In addition, in an editorial article of Manār, 1899, Riḍā declared, “whoever looks carefully at maqāṣid al-sharī‘a, he will know that religion spreads through propagation and not compulsion.”

Riḍā’s ideas are expressed through the argumentation of the young reformer against his adversary.

Also, in an article entitled “Religious Reform,” published in Manār, 1899, Riḍā asserts that “the sharī‘a is the guide of reformers because any good for human beings, which relates to this life or the hereafter, has been acknowledged in Islam and regarded as one of its maqāṣid.” Moreover, in another article published in Manār, and entitled al-Tashabbuh wa‘l-Iqtida‘, Riḍā regrets that many Muslims during his time do not accept any kind of art or science coming from Europeans because they regard it as a way of imitating non-Muslims, an act abhorred in Islam. Riḍā explains that

“The most important pillar to preserve religion and spread its correct teachings among non-believers is jihad, which depends on acquiring such sciences. Whatever is needed to get an obligation is an obligatory action. But ignorance became pervasive in our time and fanaticism against non-Muslims without understanding and knowledge of maqāṣid al-sharī‘a and the lack of knowing harms and benefits are the cause for accusing the wise people among the Europeans of bad intention.”

In addition to the many references of Riḍā to the term maqāṣid al-sharī‘a or maqāṣid al-sharī‘a, one can attain a better understanding of his maqāṣid thought through his treatment of maqāṣid al-Qur‘ān found in his al-Wahy al-Muḥammadi. Following the footsteps of ʿAbduh in the latter’s introduction to Tafsīr al-Manār, Riḍā assigns a whole chapter in his book to maqāṣid al-Qur‘ān. His treatment of the subject is far more detailed than that of ʿAbduh. He starts the chapter by declaring that the maqāṣid or aims of the Qur‘ān are intended to reform individuals and social behavior, achieve brotherhood and unity among peoples, and purify their souls through spirituality. Then, Riḍā enumerates ten maqāṣid, some of which can be regarded as maqāṣid al-sharī‘a because they directly relate to legal rulings. The first maqṣad of the Qur‘ān is the three pillars of belief, namely, belief in God, the day of resurrection, and good deeds as a proof of right belief.

The second maqṣad is to prove prophecy in general and the miracles of prophets in particular. The third maqṣad is to purify and perfect the human soul and personality. This can be achieved through the call for ḥikma, which, according to Ridā, is synonymous with practical philosophy and psychology, ethics, and the general rules of social relations. Ridā defines ḥikma as "to know something according to its essence and what it has of benefits that inspire action." He says that the word fiqh in the Qurʾān refers to ḥikma and not to the juristic meaning of specific rules of practice. The third maqṣad also includes the Qurʾān's instruction about independent reasoning and its disparagement of taqlīd. Ridā notes that while European educational systems emphasize the role of independent reasoning and logical thinking, only few Muslims, including the 'ulama', practice Islam in a way that reflects its real "rational picture." The fourth maqṣad of the Qurʾān is to call for social and political reform in a way that leads nations to unity and equality. The other form of unity is a legal one in which Ridā envisions all those under Islamic rule would be equal in their civil rights according to the principle of justice among believers and non-believers, rich and poor, and a ruler and ordinary people. Also, Ridā includes within this maqṣad an understanding that the places of worship of non-Muslims living under Islamic rule must be respected and no one should enter such places without the consent of the people in charge. In addition, the fourth maqṣad of the Qurʾān also encompasses the principle of judicial independence and the equality of all people in front of the just shariʿa. But Ridā notes that legal cases pertaining to non-Muslims that relate to personal and family matters must be excluded from the influence of Islamic courts, and must be judged by the leaders of each religious community, according to their religious traditions. But if such people decided to litigate in front of a Muslim judge, then the shariʿa must be applied. Ridā refers here to Q. 5:42, 48, and 49.

The fifth maqṣad is titled, "the general features of Islam in the field of personal obligations and prohibitions." Ridā enumerates within this maqṣad ten rules, many of which deal directly with legal theory. First, based on Q. 2:143, Islam stands in the middle of all religious traditions in terms of its balance between the right of the soul and that of the body, and the good in this life and in the hereafter.40 Second, the objective of Islam is to help human beings to achieve happiness in this life and in the hereafter through spiritual purification, right belief, good deeds, and ethical behavior. The third rule is that the aim of Islam is to call on human beings to know each other and establish good relationships. The fourth rule is that Islam is a religion of easiness and does not call for hardship in religious practices. He refers to Q. 2:286, 2:220, 2:185, 22:27, and 5:7. One of the results of this general rule is that “a religious obligation which causes hardship would be mitigated into either a less difficult obligation or totally cancelled, such as fasting the month of Ramaḍān for the one who suffers from a long-term illness. In such a case, the ill person can feed a poor person each day in Ramaḍān as a substitute for fasting.”41 As for a prohibited action, Riḍā adds, it can be permitted in cases of necessity, as clearly stated in the Qur’ān. If the prohibition is based on the principle of “closing the means to harm,” then it can be permitted in cases of extreme need (hāja) and not only necessity. The fifth rule, included within the fifth maqṣād, prohibits perceiving religion as a way of self-torture by denying what God has permitted. This is based on Q. 7:31.42 The sixth rule is that Islam has only a few religious obligations and they can be easily understood. But traditional jurists increased religious obligations through their opinions, so that knowing all such rules became difficult, and practicing all of them was impossible. Riḍā gives exam-pies of daily prayers and the ablution before prayer to argue that such practices can be easily learned without difficulty.43 The seventh rule is that religious obligation can be divided into obligations (ʿazāʾīm) and mitigations (rukḥāṣ). Ibn ʿAbbās (d. 68/687) used to prefer mitiga-tions while Ibn ʿUmar (d. 73/692) preferred obligations. Riḍā refers to Q. 35:32 which enumerates three kinds of believers according to their degrees of commitment to religious practices.44 The eighth rule states that the texts of the Qurʾān and sunna have degrees of authenticity.

Whatever is “certain” in these texts is considered the general frame-time and place of prayer: eat and drink: but waste not by excess, for God loveth work of religious knowledge. Whatever is “probable” in its authenticity or meaning allows degrees of interpretations. The Prophet in such cases of possible multiplicity of meaning used to acknowledge all the opinions of his Companions. When the Qur’anic verse in the second sūra (2:219) was revealed, and it mentioned the harm in drinking wine without clear prohibition, some Companions quit drinking wine while others continued. The Prophet accepted both positions until the verse in the fifth sūra (5:90) was revealed, which clearly prohibited such practice. Riḍá explains that religious obligations and prohibitions cannot be authenticated except through “certain” texts that are understood by everyone. The Qur’anic verses that have “uncertain” meanings and isolated hadiths, whether in their chains of authorities or meanings, depend in their application on whether they are accepted or not by specific jurists and on the ījtimā‘ of decision-making people in the field of judicial rulings and political matters. The ninth rule is that no one shall be punished for what is in his or her heart or mind. Punishments are exclusively applied in cases of specific crimes or infringements on practical rules related to the public good and rights. The last rule, included in the fifth maqāṣid, states that religious rituals are decided according to what we know of the Prophet’s practice, and no one can add or change them according to one’s personal preference. These rituals have the goals of spiritual purification and remembrance of God. Riḍá concludes, after enumerating the ten rules, that each one of them is liable to be regarded as a special maqāṣid of the maqāṣid of revelation.

It is clear that the ten rules that compose the fifth maqāṣid of the Qur’ān present a general understanding of the shari‘a according to Riḍá’s view. The remaining five maqāṣid deal with the general rules that pertain to specific fields of legal activity, namely, political and international, financial, warfare and peace making, the status of women and their rights, and slavery.

The sixth maqāṣid of the Qur’ān is entitled, “Explaining Islamic political and international rule: its kind and general principles.” There are several rules and principles that pertain to this topic. Riḍá notes that the first fundamental rule of Islamic government is that the person who heads the government in Islamic society, whether called an imām or caliph, is entitled to execute the shari‘a. The umma has the right to appoint him and remove him from office. Ridā quotes Q. 42: 38 and 3:159 to support his view.47 The Prophet, Ridā argues, used to consult with his Companions in matters pertaining to political, military, and financial affairs that were not regulated in the Qur'ān. The wisdom behind calling for practicing shūrā in a general way is to allow Muslims to choose the best method, according to their time and place, that achieves the goal of consultation.48 Ridā continues his discussion by noting that one of many religious proofs that political and judicial legislation is the right of the umma is that the Qur'ān, when speaking on such matters, always addresses the Muslim community at large. Such references are found, for example, in the first verse of the ninth sūra, which reads, “A (declaration) of immunity from God and His Messenger to those of the...” and Q. 49:9 which reads, “If two parties among the believers fall into a quarrel, make ye peace between them: but if one of them transgresses beyond bounds against the other, then fight ...” Such a reference to the community at large is also found in the verses that address the rules related to properties, booty, and the status of women.49 Ridā adds that some great legal theorists declared that sovereignty in the Islamic state is the right of the umma through the role of the ahl al-hall wa’l-’aqd, who should be responsible for appointing caliphs and imāms or remove them from office if the public good requires such a decision. Imam Rāzī (d. 606/1210) defined khilāfa as “general leadership given to one person according to specific conditions.”

Rāzī stated in the last condition that the “umma has the right to remove the imām from office due to mischief.” Moreover, al-Sā’d al-Taftāzānī (d. 793/1390) said in his Sharḥ al-Maqāṣid as a commentary on Rāzī’s definition, “what he meant by the umma is the ahl al-hall wa’l-’aqd.” Ridā observes that such a basic rule of the Islamic state is the greatest political reform which the Qur'ān declared in a time when all nations were enslaved by tyrannical governments. This rule was applied first by the Prophet and then by the four well-guided caliphs. Ridā adds that the Qur'ān describes how the Queen of Sheba consulted with her people to bring an example of the best policy.50 But some medieval jurists, Riḍā observes, made shūrā only recommended, without any obligatory status, to satisfy the will of kings and princes.51

The second principle that relates to the sixth maqāsad encompasses the “fundamentals of legislation in Islam.” Here, Riḍā repeats his dominant idea that after consulting the three main sources of Islamic law, namely, Qur‘ān, sunna, and ijmā‘, rules that pertain to political activities can be achieved through ijtihād. However, Riḍā quotes for the first time in his Wahy a hadith in which the Prophet said to one of his military commanders, “If you surround a fortress, and the people inside ask you to rule according to God’s law, do not do that, but apply your own judgment, because you do not know if you can achieve treating them in accordance with God’s law or not.” Riḍā comments on the hadith that this is one of the clearest hadiths that gives the right to make decisions in political and military affairs to the caliphs and leaders because they are part of the general benefits (maṣāliḥ ‘āmma) that change according to time and place.

Then, Riḍā adds an important paragraph in which he divides the legal rulings of the Qur‘ān and sunna into two categories. First, are rulings that deal with specific actions and events. These are composed of two types. First are rules that have a “certain” quality in terms of their authenticity and meaning, and therefore do not allow any ijtihād and must be applied unless there is a shari‘i reason to prevent such an application. Examples of such exceptional reasons are the lack of a condition necessary for applying the rule such as abandoning the application of a Qur‘ānic rule of punishment (hadd) due to doubt or a case of necessity. Here Riḍā brings again the example of ‘Umar’s decision not to apply the hadd for thieves during the year of famine. The other type of specific rulings, mentioned in the Qur‘ān and Prophetic traditions, include rules that have only “probable” quality in terms of either authenticity or meaning. Those are applied according to the ijtihād of the decision-making people as described before.

Riḍā introduces in this section of Wahy, for the first time, the second category of Qur‘ānic and Prophetic rules. These are described as “general rules” of all legal rulings. The most important of them are the search for truth and justice; equality in rights, testimonies, and rulings; the preservation of maṣāliḥ and prevention of mafāsid; the consideration of local custom (‘urf) according to its conditions; the abandonment of applying hudūd in cases of doubt; necessities permit prohibitions; necessity has to be determined according to its conditions; the main aim of mu'āmalāt is gaining virtues and avoiding vices; and lastly the prohibition of injustice.\footnote{Ridā, Wahy, p. 210.} It will be more clear through Ridā's legal opinions and fatwās that the kind of free ijtihād that he envisions in the field of mu'amalāt is very much directed by such general rulings that he enlists as part of the maqāsid of the Qur'ān. Ridā, however, covers only a few of those general rules in his treatment of the sixth maqāsid. He quotes Qur'ānic verses that call for achieving justice and equality when judging between people and also the prohibition of injustice.\footnote{Ridā, Wahy, p. 210.} But he elaborates on the rule, which states "the aim of the mu'amalāt is to achieve virtues and prevent vices." Ridā declares, "Whoever uses induction (istiqrā') in studying the rulings of the sharī'a finds that all rules, mentioned in the Qur'ān or the sunna, whether related to personal, civil, political, or military matters, are aimed at the achievement of the goals of truth, justice, trust, keeping promises, mercy, love, tranquility and avoiding injustice, lying, mistrust, usury (riba'), and bribery."\footnote{Ibid.}

After stating the specific and general rules of the sharī'a, Ridā claims that penal laws in Islam are constituted of two kinds. First are the hudūd, which means the obligation to apply a specific punishment for a specific crime according to the text, such as the execution of murderers to keep the life of the community, the punishment of adultery to preserve the family honor and progeny, the punishment for stealing to preserve security, and the punishment for intoxication to preserve the mind. Ridā explains that some jurists do not regard the punishment for intoxication as a hadd because it is not mentioned in the Qur'ān and not determined in the sunna. The wisdom behind applying the hudūd, Ridā observes, is to deter criminals and other non-virtuous people. But in the case of punishment for adultery, Ridā comments that jurists made conditions to apply the hadd, which rarely can be achieved except through confession. It is also narrated in a hadīth that the one who commits adultery should hide his problem and he or she is not encouraged to confess. In the end, Ridā notes that the application of hudūd is the right of the caliph or the imām, and no one else can apply such penal laws. The second type of criminal laws are those called ta'zir (disciplinary punishment), which depend solely on the ijtihad of rulers, in the light of the general rules mentioned above.

The seventh maqasad of the Qur'an is related to "directions toward financial reform." Ridâ argues that this maqasad deals with one of the major social problems which is "the tyranny of wealth." The other three social injustices are: "the aggression of war and its severity," "the injustice against woman," and "the injustice against the weak and captives by denying their freedom." For each of these four social ills, Ridâ dedicates a separate maqasad. The main general rules or principles related to financial reform are encouraging spending for the sake of God to support the poor; being wise in spending; the protection of private property; the obligation to pay the zakât (alms giving); the obligation to spend on one's wife and family; and spending on the poor as an obligation to expiate one's sins. Ridâ quotes Qur'anic verses to support his claim that all these principles are declared in the Qur'an. What is more related to our topic, however, is that Ridâ regards those principles or general rules as part of the maqasid of the Qur'an through his quotations of verses that deal with specific questions. For example, he quotes Q. 65:7, which reads, "Let the man of means spend according to what God has given him." Ridâ argues that although this verse was revealed to deal with the question of spending on the divorced wife during her grace period (idda), the instruction is general. He refers to a principle in Islamic legal theory which states that "the main reference in any verse is to the general meaning and not just to the specific reason of revelation." Ridâ also declares that if one does not interpret Qur'anic instructions on financial matters according to their hikam, illal, and benefits, God's word would not be called hikma. Ridâ quotes Q. 17:29 which reads, "Make not thy hand tied (like a niggard's) to thy neck, nor stretch it forth to its utmost reach, so that thou become blameworthy and destitute," and comments that God made the reason for the negative value of spending without limits the end result of such action, which is to be blameworthy and destitute.

Therefore, Ridâ, following the footsteps of Abduh, finds that Qur'anic verses cannot be called "words of wisdom" (hikma) unless they refer to general principles that guide humanity as well as to the aims or purposes of legal rules. But a legitimate objection to Ridâ's principles of financial reform, included within the seventh maqasad, is that most of them do not constitute specific rulings that can bring change and achieve real reform in Muslim societies. This objection, which is related to Riḍā’s maqāṣid thought in general, as portrayed in al-Wahy al-Muḥammadi, will be checked through his fatwās to see if such general rules and principles can in fact generate legal opinions on specific questions.

In the eighth maqṣad, Riḍā deals with the “reformation of the warfare system and the prevention of its vices and conditioning its legitimacy on what brings benefit to humanity.” The subtitle of this maqṣad is “a general outlook at the philosophy of warfare, peace making, and treaties.” It is clear from the title and the subtitle that the main topic of this maqṣad is more specific than the previous one. One can clearly note that Riḍā’s writings on this topic reflect the events of his day, mainly the post-World War One colonization of Muslim countries by European powers. He declares first that if warfare reflects a struggle to achieve justice and bring good to people, then it can be legitimized according to the Qur’ān. But if it aims at the occupation of other nations and the oppression of the weak by the strong, as the European powers did, then warfare must be stopped because it is unjust. In addition, he notes that the aim of peace treaties should be achieving reform, justice, and equality among people and not the domination of one nation over the other. He cites the treaty of Versailles, after World War One, as an example of an ill-advised treaty. Then, Riḍā states what he calls “the most important rules of warfare and peacemaking in Islam.” These rules are the following. The first rule permits fighting aggressors in order to stop their aggression, but prohibits Muslims from starting any aggression against non-Muslims. Riḍā quotes Q. 2:190, which reads, “Fight in the cause of God those who fight you, but do not transgress limits; for God loveth not transgressors,” and comments that this verse is muḥkam (clear in meaning) and cannot be abrogated. The Prophet’s wars were defensive in nature. Second, the positive aim of fighting in Islam, after facing aggression and injustice, is the protection of the followers of all religions from being oppressed or compelled to convert to another religion. Riḍā cites Q. 22: 39-40, which read, “To those against whom war is made, permission is given (to fight), because they are wronged—and verily, God is most powerful for their aid. (They are) those who have been expelled from their homes in defiance of right- (for no cause) except that they say, ‘Our Lord is God.’ Had not God checked one set of people by means of another, there would surely have been pulled down monasteries, churches, synagogues, and mosques, in which the name of God is commemorated in abundant measure..." Third, peace is the original state of relationships between nations, and warfare is only a necessity that might be conducted to achieve good and prevent injustice. Ridā cites Q. 8:61 which reads, “But if the enemy inclines towards peace, do thou (also) incline towards peace, and trust in God...”, to prove that peace is preferred over war. Fourth, the perfect preparation for the war should be in a way that might prevent it. The fifth rule is entitled “Mercy with Captives.” Ridā cites Q. 76:8 stating, “And they feed for the love of God the indigent, the orphan, and the captive.”56 The sixth rule is “fulfilling the obligations of treaties without any violations.” Here Ridā cites Q. 16:91, which states, “Fulfill the covenant of God when ye have entered into it, and break not your oaths after ye have confirmed them...” The seventh and last rule, related to the eighth maqāsid of the Qur’ān, states that “the poll tax (jizya) is a consequence to fighting and not a cause.” Ridā comments on Q. 9:29, which reads, “Fight those who believe not in God nor the last day, nor hold that forbidden which hath been forbidden by God and His messenger, nor acknowledge the religion of truth, from among the People of the Book, until they pay the Jizya with willing submission, and feel themselves subdued...” He argues that this verse calls on Muslims to fight those mentioned when there is a legitimate reason to do so, such as an aggression against them or their country, or oppressing them and denying religious freedom to Muslims. This is the case of the Byzantines against Muslims during the time of the Prophet and leading to the battle of Tabûk, with which the verse is dealing.57 The poll tax was instituted in such cases to ensure first the security of Muslims and also to place an obligation on them to protect and defend the People of the Book who paid the poll tax. Ridā adds that the hikma of the jizya is that it was not a tax of conquerors on the conquered people in order to subjugate them under their will. Rather, it is an obligation on Muslims to defend against any aggression those non-Muslims who paid the poll tax. “This is well known from the behavior of the Prophet’s Companions who were the most knowledgeable of maqāsid al-shari‘a and the most just in applying them.”58 He cites some examples from Baladhuri’s (d. 279/892) Futūḥ al-Buldān and Azdī’s (c. 165/782) Futūḥ al-Shām in which the

57. Ridā, Wahy, p. 234.

Companions gave back the amount of the poll tax taken from the People of Hims because the Muslims could not protect them from the Byzantines during the battle of Yarmūk. Therefore, Rıdā observes, warfare in Islam is limited to preventing harm and achieving good for human beings. As for the non-Muslim states with whom the Islamic state has peace treaties, they are called ahl al-‘ahd and the peace arrangement must be fulfilled.

The ninth maqāsida of the Qur’ān is “giving women all human, religious, and civil rights.” Rıdā emphasizes in this maqāsida the right of women to acquire and manage properties, their rights in dowry and inheritance, and their complete independence in representing themselves in courts. All these rights are compared to the status of Arab women before Islam. Rıdā adds that although Islam placed the right of divorce in the hand of the husband, it also gave the right to the woman to condition her marriage contract with the right of initiating divorce if she wanted. This is based on the opinion of some jurists that any condition (sharti) in a contract is a legitimate one unless it contradicts a “certain” text in the Qur’ān or sunna.

The tenth maqāsida is entitled “The emancipation of slaves.” Rıdā argues that the shari‘a ensured the just treatment of slaves during the time of the Prophet, and included rules that can gradually lead to the abolition of slavery. The way to do that was first to limit slavery to war captives with the encouragement to free them, and second, the gradual emancipation of the old slaves. This is clear in the actions of the Prophet during and after the battles of Banū al-Muṭṭalaq, Fath Mecca, and Ghazwat Ḥunayn. In those three military exhibitions, Rıdā notes, the Muslims were victorious, and the Prophet’s wish to free the war captives showed that “the spirit of the shari‘a calls for the freedom of slave captives without any gain for Muslims except doing a good deed.” Based on this spirit, Rıdā enlists several cases in which Islamic law ensures the freedom of slaves and regards this action as a religious act of devotion to God. In several cases of expiation of certain sins, the Qur’ān prescribes freeing slaves as either an obligatory or an optional act to fulfill this expiation.

Rıdā’s maqāsid thought in al-Wahy al-Muḥammadi presents a general outlook on the shari‘a in which principles and general rules are mentioned and authenticated as “certain” by virtue of their Qurʾānic origin. All rulings on muʿāmalāt have to achieve the goal of being in line with such general rules and guiding principles. Riḍā’s method of formulating such principles follows ʿAbduh’s in first the thematic character of dealing with each question of inquiry by collecting all or most of Qurʾānic verses on the subject, and second through the concentration on the hikma of any Qurʾānic rule. The phrases in such Qurʾānic verses that focus on the rationale behind having the rules are emphasized in the interpretive process and then generalized into guiding principles or rules of action. In addition, Riḍā presents in his writings on maqāṣid al-Qurʾān a new genre of religious writings, practiced mostly by later maqāṣid thinkers, in which different sections of fiqh, or Islamic jurisprudence, are introduced by an enumeration and elaboration on the main maqāṣid of the shariʿa that relate to the specific section, such as financial, political, etc. However, it remains worth attempting to see if such theorization can be translated into a practical effect in Riḍā’s fatwās, but at least one can confidently declare such an effect in his writing on maqāṣid al-Qurʾān, such as in the cases of slavery and warfare and peacemaking in Islam.

Riḍā’s Fatwās

Riḍā’s fatwās appeared as a special section in his Manār, from 1903 to 1935, to answer questions on different topics of Islamic jurisprudence. According to al-Munajjid and Khūrī, who published Riḍā’s fatwās in six volumes, the latter issued 1061 fatwās in the Manār.62 Some of these, for sure, are questions about Riḍā’s opinions on matters related to dogmatics, reason and revelation in Islam, how to achieve Muslim unity and the like. That is why Riḍā did not name this section in the Manār as dedicated for fatwās in the early issues but rather a section for “questions and fatwās.” However, in his fourteenth issue of the seventh volume of the Manār, he named the section “ḥab al-fatwā” (the section on fatwā). Thus, not all the 1061 entries, which are listed in Riḍā’s Fatwā, deal with legal questions. In addition, to know the limits of Riḍā’s fatwās and their degree of technicality, he explains in his fatwā on “the fundamentals of Islam,” dated 1926, that the aim of the section on fatwās in the Manār is to provide concise answers to legal questions and to decline from delving into very detailed points of Islamic jurisprudence. Since Riḍā, throughout his fatwās, refers his readers to his theoretical works, published first periodically in Manār, such as Yusr al-Islam, Muhāwarat, and Khilāfa, he undoubtedly expects the inquirer to get a more detailed answer to the theoretical part of his question in such works.

In fatwā 685, dated 1926, Riḍā asserts that “civil and political rulings must be based on the prevention of harms and the preservation of the public good. The judicial rulings must be based on justice and equality, and the obligation to preserve religion, life, mind, property, and honor.” In fatwā 201, dated 1906, Riḍā argues that the aim of mu‘āmalāt rulings is to prevent injustice from being committed among people. He also states in fatwā 243, dated 1907, that “the pillars of judgeship and political rule in Islam are the Qur‘ān, sunna, ijtihād, and consultation. These are based on the maxim: preventing the mafāsid and preserving the mašāliḥ.” In addition, in fatwā 304, dated 1909, Riḍā writes that “on questions related to worldly affairs in mu‘āmalāt, the jurist should not look only to the literal meanings (Zawāhir) of the Qur‘ān and sunna but also to analyzing the cases in question, to know their actual circumstances, by using induction and research.” Here, it becomes clear that Riḍā’s call for the consideration of maqāṣid al-shar‘a in mu‘āmalāt in this fatwā is translated into a clear reference to the “spirit” of Islamic law that might be realized through a non-literal sense of textual meanings. Thus, Riḍā’s methodology in mu‘āmalāt, through his consideration of maqāṣid al-shar‘a, is not limited to using mašlaḥa mursala as the main tool to achieve his goal. First, some of his fatwās on mu‘āmalāt are based on his specific interpretation of Qur‘ānic or ḥadīth texts in which the aim of the legal rule becomes the central focus in his decision. Second, in his response to several questions that lie outside the realm of textual evidence, he not only employs the principle of mašlaḥa mursala but also sadd al-dharārī (closing the means to harm) to actualize the maxim of daf‘ al-mafāsid, which is considered one of maqāṣid al-shar‘a.

64. Riḍā, Fātūwā, vol. 5, p. 1873. These five mašāliḥ are considered by Shāṭībī as the necessary ones which the shar‘a strives to preserve. See Shāṭībī’s Muafaqat, vol. 2, pp. 9 ff.
Examples of cases in which Ridā clearly interprets the texts in a way that focuses on the legal aims are the fatwās on the prohibition of using gold and silver plates and ornaments; eating the meat of animals slaughtered by the People of the Book; the question of bank interest and the prohibition of usury; making statues and paintings of human and animal forms; using alcohol for medical reasons; accepting evidence in court based on a telegraphic message; listening to singing and music; the prohibition of gambling; the dissolution of marriage contracts due to a physical or mental defect of the husband or wife.

On the Prohibition of Using Gold and Silver Plates and Ornaments

Several questions addressed to Ridā in the fatwās section of Manār relate to the well-known prohibition of using gold and silver plates.68 The narrated hadiths, most of them accepted by all schools, prohibit men to wear gold ornaments. There are also hadiths that allow men to wear silver ornaments, and others that prohibit the use of gold and silver utensils (āniya). Some of the questions that appear in the fatwās enquire about the prohibition itself, and Ridā responds clearly with listing such hadiths, calling for their literal application. But when Ridā is asked about cases such as whether it is permitted for the Islamic state to use gold or silver medals to praise civil or military servants, or whether a Muslim can eat from a gold or silver plate offered in the house of the People of the Book, his response is very much influenced by his consideration of the maqāṣid of such prohibitions. In fatwā 608, dated 1923,69 Ridā responds to the questions of using gold and silver utensils or wearing gold medals (or silver watches), by declaring first that even if a jurist can use qiyās to argue that the i'ila in the prohibition of using gold and silver utensils is the same in using gold and silver medals, and consequently the validity of this qiyās, Zāhirite jurists and some Traditionists concluded that no religious prohibition can be reached through qiyās. In other words, Ridā is saying that even if qiyās in such cases is valid, we will end up with a prohibition or disliked action which cannot be included within the category of “ḥarām” since religious prohibition has to be indicated through “certain” texts and not through human ijtihād. Although the end result of such distinction will be the same in the sense that such an action will still be prohibited, the lack of religious character of the prohibition can make room for the consideration of maṣlaḥa when it is relevant to do so.

But Riḍā, in relation to this question, does not stop at attacking the “religious” content of qiyyās. Rather, he looks into the reason for the prohibition and concludes that it is to avoid an extravagant way of life. In fatwā 76, published in the Manār, 1904, Riḍā, after enlisting some of the juristic opinions on the ‘illa of the prohibition, declares that > « the ḥadīth which shows that using gold and silver is the feature of the People of Paradise indicate that the Muslim is prohibited from a lavish and extravagant way of life until he or she ignores their religious obligations and is in a state of weakness in the face of his/her enemies. This extravagant way of life causes the decay of nations and the destruction of cities, and it is the ‘illa of injustice, mischief, and the instigation of quarrels and transgression among people. »

Riḍā adds that if this is the ‘illa of the prohibition, then it is not a “religious” prohibition that must be extended to any kind of use. Thus, if a Muslim drinks from a gold or silver utensil in the home of a non-believer, or even a Muslim, without intending to mimic such way of life, his action does not violate a religious prohibition. But how can one decide if a certain use of gold or silver commodities is lavish or not? For Riḍā this depends on the customs in each society. If a society is very poor, then most of such uses would be regarded as lavish. This was the reason for the Shāfi‘ite jurists to prohibit any kind of use except what is stated in Prophetic traditions. Riḍā also observes that the modern scholars of political economy studied the effect of manufacturing plates, furniture, etc. for aesthetic purposes and whether there is any harm in doing so. They found that societies can benefit from such kind of production because it is a way for rich people to spend their money and this creates vocations for less fortunate people. This is the kind of benefit that the people call kaμāliyyāt and Shāṭībī in Mu‘aqāṯ calls taḥsīniyyāt. Therefore, there is a maṣlaḥa for the umma.

(the Muslim community) in having gold or silver commodities but on the condition that it must be within the ethical framework. But Riḍā concludes that for precautionary reasons, it is better for the Muslim to avoid the kind of use clearly mentioned in the hadiths and consider the maṣlaḥa elsewhere.71 In fatwā 117, published in the Manār, 1904, Riḍā responds to the question of medals, especially gold or silver ones. He argues that this practice was not mentioned in the sunna, and therefore its rule depends on the maxim: the prohibition of every harmful act and the permission of every benefit. Then he reminds his reader that although in some cases offering such medals might be a benefit to the society, the current situation in Egypt being that gaining such medals means getting honorary titles in the government. This leads to the fact that people became obsessed with getting such medals even if they pay bribes. Therefore, Riḍā concludes, the current use of such medals must be prohibited.72

ON THE PERMISSION TO EAT THE SLAUGHTERED ANIMALS OF THE PEOPLE OF THE BOOK

In fatwā 154, published in the Manār, 1905, a Muslim from Singapore informs Riḍā that he received a book, written by an Egyptian and called al-Ta’āḍil al-Islamiyya, in which the author repudiates ‘Abduh’s fatwā on the permission to eat from the meat of animals slaughtered by the People of the Book.73 He then asks Riḍā whether the Qur’ānic permission is conditioned on specific ways of slaughtering animals that were known during the time of the Prophet and were followed by the People of the Book at that time. Riḍā responds first that the question of eating the food of the People of the Book is not a “ta’abbud” one (i.e. not considered fixed in form as a religious obligation similar to ḭabāt). He also observes that “nothing related to the details of the legal case that is attached to the spirit (ruḥ) of religion and its essence except the prohibition of offering a slaughtered animal to other than God, because this is one of the rituals of pagans and the rites of the

73. The inquirer in Riḍā’s fatwā, 154, also asks him whether ‘Abduh permitted eating the meat of animals killed by violent blow (mawqūdha), which is prohibited in Q. 5:3. polytheists. Therefore, Muslims are prohibited from eating such animals or contributing to such practices. Riḍā adds

«God wanted us to differentiate between polytheists and the People of the Book, and therefore He permitted their food for us without any condition, similarly to the permission to marry from them while Muslims are prohibited from marrying polytheists. Thus the ḥikma of this permission is to have a good relationship with the People of the Book and not because they slaughter their animals in a certain way.»

It is clear that those jurists who objected to 'Abduh’s Transvaal fatwā were arguing that although there is a Qur'anic verse (5:5) which clearly permits eating the meat slaughtered by Christians and Jews, current Christians and Jews do not slaughter their animals similar to what their ancestors did during the time of revelation, and consequently one should not eat from the food of contemporary Christians and Jews. Riḍā, after reminding his readers of the Qur’anic verse, argues that this verse is general in its meaning and we cannot condition its effect based on an assumption that the way in which past Christian and Jews slaughtered their animals was different from our contemporaries, and therefore we should not eat the meat offered by them. If such logic is true, Riḍā argues, then we should look into every ruling of the sharī'a and say that the permission or prohibition is conditioned by the way such a ruling was applied during the time of the Prophet. “Do we have to say, for example, that we should have a Friday prayer with an exactly similar mosque to that of the Prophet or a similar number of people attending the service?” As for the objection that 'Abduh’s fatwā permits eating from the meat of an animal hacked to death (mawqūdha) by the People of the Book, a state of killing the animal that is prohibited in the Qur’ān, Riḍā contends that ‘Abduh’s fatwā did not permit eating from the meat of such animals but on the general observation that the People of the Book in our time slaughter their animals before eating their meat. Riḍā concludes that his argumentation on this question is supported by the evidence from the Qur’ān, sunna, and the deep understanding of the sharī'a.

75. For a detailed account of the criticism that ‘Abduh faced after issuing his fatwā of permission, see C. C. Adams, “Muhammad ‘Abduh and the Transvaal Fatwa”, MacDonald Presentation, vol. 3, 1933, pp. 12-29.
Rashid Riḍā and Maqāsid al-Sharī‘a

It is clear from the previous exposition of Riḍā’s fatwā on the permission to eat from the meat of animals slaughtered by Christians and Jews that he sees the intention of the Lawgiver regarding eating such meat of non-Muslims as similar to eating any other kind of food which does not have a religious component. The only religious prohibition is against eating from the meat offered to deities other than God. The fact that Qur’ānic texts prohibit eating only from such meat slaughtered by polytheists without stating any prohibition of eating from the meat of their animals, if not offered to their deities, indicates clearly that eating meat is not different from eating other kinds of food except for the obvious religious reason of sacrifice. The only exception to this general permission is to know that the animal was killed in a way prohibited in the Qur’ān, i.e. not slaughtered. Therefore, the reasoning behind Riḍā’s argument is to focus on the purpose of the prohibition and the permission, although his argument follows the literal understanding of the Qur’ānic verse related to the People of the Book.

ON MAKING STATUES AND PAINTINGS OF HUMAN AND ANIMAL FORMS

In more than one fatwā, Riḍā was asked about the prohibition of making statues and paintings of human and animal form in Islam.77 While ʿAbduh dealt with this issue only in his articles describing his trip to Sicily,78 and therefore did not offer a sophisticated legal discourse on this legal question, Riḍā in fatwā 547, published in the Manār, 1917, engages in a very detailed treatment of the subject. After listing fifteen hadīths on the subject and then enumerating thirteen points on the opinions of early jurists regarding those hadīths, Riḍā concludes with what he thinks is the main instructions in those hadīths. First, the musawwirūn (those who make statues or paintings of human and animal forms) will be chastised on the Day of Judgment and will be ordered to resurrect into life what they made because of their intent to challenge the creation of God by producing a similar form.79 Second,

77. For the traditional Sunnī views on the subject, see al-Jazārī, Al-Fiqḥ ‘Alā al-Madhāhib al-‘Arba‘a (Beirut: Dar al-Thaqalayn, 1998), vol. 2, pp. 73-75.
79. The Arabic word, used in those hadīths to denote the intention of statue makers, is yudāḥāna. Some traditional jurists understand the meaning as “to make a the muṣawwir is cursed in the hadīth, like those who made the graves of their Prophets as places of worship to God. The hadīth mentions that the latter people used to make statues and paintings of the pious among them and put them in their temples. They are described as the worst of creation. Third, it is prohibited to hang curtains that have such paintings, and must be torn apart or removed. Fourth, the reasoning behind the prohibition is mentioned in one hadīth that “we are not obliged to make shapes from rocks and clay.” In another hadīth, Rīḍā adds, it is stated that paintings distract the Muslim who is making prayer if they are located in front of him or her. It is also stated in a hadīth that “the angels do not enter a house which has a statue or a dog.” Fifth, one can also conclude from the hadīth literature that it is permitted to wear clothes or have pillows that contain pictures of animal forms, and that the Prophet used such pillows, as in the hadīth narrated by Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal (d. 241/855). Eighth, changing the picture of an animal to make it similar to a tree by removing its head, for instance, will permit its use. Seventh, if there is any shape of a cross in a painting or a picture, it must be removed. Rīḍā then states his conclusion that the reason for the expected severe punishment on the Day of Judgment for taṣwīr is twofold: first due to an intent to challenge God’s creation by having a similar one, and second to prevent the worshipping of statues of prophets and pious people, although the maker of such statues did not intend to do so. Thus, the second reason of the prohibition is based on sadd al-dharāʾī. Rīḍā quotes Ibn Ḥajar al-Askalānī (d. 852/1449) in the latter’s commentary on Bukhārī’s (d. 256/870) Sahīḥ, that the reason for the prohibition of taṣwīr is similar to those who were cursed by God because they built places of worship to God on the graves of their prophets, and later their posterity worshipped those graves. Ibn Ḥajar declares that the prohibition of having graves of pious people in mosques is based on sadd al-dharāʾī, and if one is sure that there is no danger of worshipping such graves, then one can permit such practice. Rīḍā adds that applying the rule of sadd al-dharāʾī differs from time to time and the kind of taṣwīr existing. Because the statues, which were venerated similar creation.” But for Rīḍā and other jurists, the verb has the connotation of intending to challenge God’s creation.

before Islam to the level of worship, were of human and animal forms, the Companion Ibn Abbās permitted the one who asked him about painting the shapes of trees to do so. But since the pictures that portray human and animal forms became used only for aesthetic reasons, and the possibility of worshipping them disappeared, some of the salaf (early fathers) put such pictures in their houses. However, Riḍā observes, the possibility of worshipping pictures of prophets and saints is still valid, similarly to what some Muslims were doing at the tombs of venerated people. Riḍā concludes that except for the prohibition of portraying prophets and venerated people, there is no harm in having statues and paintings of human and animal forms because there is no intention to sanctify certain people or animals by making statues and paintings, which later might become objects of worship. In fact, Riḍā adds, there are many benefits from having such pictures such as knowing what animals and plants look like when listed in a dictionary, in the sciences of natural history, medicine, anatomy, and for military purposes. Moreover, modern governments need such pictures in their political and administrative activities.

This fatwā shows that Riḍā’s reasoning is very much based on his contemplation of the hikma of the legal rule pertaining to making statues and pictures of human and animal forms. If the practice leads to worshipping such works of art, then it must be prohibited. But since there is no intention by the artist to either challenge God’s creation or offer such statues for people to worship, then Muslims are permitted to have such a practice, and in fact they are encouraged to do so if there are benefits for the Muslim community.82

ON CONSUMING ALCOHOL FOR MEDICAL REASONS AND ITS USE AS A COMPONENT IN PERFUMES AND OTHER CHEMICALS

In fatwā 607, Riḍā deals with questions addressed to him from India in which a muftī, named Muḥammad Shafiq al-Rahmān, issued a fatwā prohibiting the use of alcohol for medical treatment.83 He also prohibited the use of any chemical, such as paints, in which alcohol is a component. His reasoning is based on a claim of consensus among Muslim jurists that khamr is impure (najis), and consequently if any intoxicating material is used as a component in any chemical, the end product will be impure and hence cannot be used. This prohibition mostly applied to using chemicals that contain alcohol to paint mosques. The impurity of khamr, according to the Indian mufti, is mentioned in the Qur'anic verse which prohibits the consumption of khamr by describing it as rijs, a term that denotes impurity. Ridā first rejects the claim of the consensus that khamr, whether made of grape wine or not, is physically an impure material. He contends with the Indian mufti that the term rijs in the Qur'ān does not refer only to khamr but also to gambling (maysir) among other prohibited practices. No one can say that there is a physical impurity in gambling but rather a moral impurity of the practice itself. This is true also for khamr. He mentions that the question of whether khamr is pure or impure is a matter of disagreement among Muslims jurists. But even with the assumption of impurity, adding an impure material to others does not make the end product necessarily impure. In fact, alcohol is used for cleaning and disinfecting and cannot be declared religiously impure, especially because it is different from khamr (i.e. fermented grape wine) in its chemical composition. What mostly relates to our purpose, however, is that Ridā looks into the reasons behind the prohibition, which are declared in the Qur'ān as causing quarreling among Muslims and forgetting to remember God and the prayer (Q. 5:91). If the consumption of khamr is intended for its effect of intoxication, then using a little amount for medical reasons, providing that there is no other medicine available, is permitted because this will not lead to intoxication and consequently to the negative effects mentioned in the Qur'ān. The same is true in using chemicals with alcoholic components in paints and other materials.

One can see that the hikma of the prohibition is taken into consideration in Ridā's reasoning. In juristic terms, Ridā argues that materials such as paints are not khamr because they do not intoxicare if consumed even if alcohol is a component of them, and therefore they are not included in the prohibition. As for alcohol in perfumes, it is treated in a way that if consumed, it might cause intoxication but also severe medical problems. It is thus not intended for consumption and cannot be regarded as khamr. For the case of using khamr for medical reasons, Ridā explains that it is a matter of disagreement among jurists. It depends on whether one can regard such use as a case of necessity or not. Al-Shafi'i, for example, did not regard the case of a person dying from thirst as a necessity that allows him to drink wine to preserve his life similar to the permission to eat pork meat in such a case. Abu Hanifa permitted such action by considering it a case of necessity. Rida quotes the Qur'anic verse, "And He hath mentioned to you whatever He prohibited, except for what you do out of necessity," to argue that any rule of prohibition in the sharia can endure a case of necessity because the sharia is based on easiness. On the question of the medical consumption of alcohol, Rida reiterates his conviction that taking a medicine that has an alcoholic component is not intended for intoxication and does not lead to the harms of such consumption, mentioned in the Qur'an. But if one takes large amounts of such medicines in order to be intoxicated, then this is definitely prohibited. Finally, Rida draws on Shatibi's Mufaqat to show that the sharia aims at preserving the necessary masalih, which are the preservation of religion, life, honor, and property. According to this understanding, Rida argues, the permission for having alcoholic drug for medication lies within the aim of preserving life in Islam. The other uses of materials that have an alcoholic component are permitted based on Shatibi's reference to the "needed" and "complimentary" masalih that the sharia also aims to achieve.

On the Question of Bank Interest and the Prohibition of Usury

Rida received several questions about 'Abduh's fatwa which apparently allowed taking interest in a savings account established through post offices in Egypt. According to many Muslim jurists, this transaction is prohibited because it is described as a usurious contract included in what the Qur'anic prohibition called riba. Any guaranteed profit that does not have the possibility of loss is considered riba, and therefore banned in Islamic law. Rida responds to these questions by first arguing that there are several conditions which medieval jurists put forward to validate contracts.88 These conditions should not be considered religious rulings (ta'abbud) but rather an interpretive effort based on ijtihād. Thus, in order to determine the definition of ribā, one needs to look into the Qur'ānic injunctions first and foremost, then to Prophetic traditions that are sound and authoritative. Riḍā quotes Ṭabarī’s (d. 310/923) commentary on the Qur’ān to argue that the Qur’ānic prohibition of the practice of ribā is precisely a prohibition of what is known as ribā al-jāhiliyya, a usurious practice that was dominant among Arabs before Islam. According to Ṭabarī and other sources, ribā al-jāhiliyya is a transaction through which a lender agrees to postpone the payment of a loan for the borrower, which already contains a profit for the lender, on the condition that the profit is substantially increased. This situation, argues Riḍā, caused a serious economic problem for poor people because they could not repay their loans and they continued to be in debt for the rest of their lives. In juristic terms it is called ribā al-nasī‘a.89 Riḍā also quotes Ibn Qayyim al-Jawziyya in his I‘lām al-Mu‘aqiqīn, who argues that the prohibited ribā in the Qur’ān is ribā al-nasī‘a. As for having a loan with an original interest, this is called ribā al-fadl. According to Ibn al-Qayyim, this kind of contract is prohibited in Prophetic traditions not because of its essence as an invalid transaction but rather because its practice will lead into having ribā al-nasī‘a. Thus, according to Ibn al-Qayyim, ribā al-fadl is prohibited based on the principle of sadd al-dharrā‘i. Ibn al-Qayyim concludes that whatever is prohibited in the shāri‘a for its own essence (muḥarram li-dhā‘thīhī) can be permitted only in case of absolute necessity (darūra). But whatever is prohibited based on sadd al-dharrā‘i, such as ribā al-fadl, can be permitted in cases of necessity and need (ḥāja). That is why the Prophet permitted the sale of ‘arāyā despite its clear inclusion within ribā al-fadl.90

Riḍā, however, after referring to Ibn al-Qayyim’s theorization, advances his own view based on his consideration of maqāsid al-sharī‘a. He argues that the hikma of the prohibition of ribā al-nasī‘a in the Qur’ān is clearly mentioned in 2: 279. The injustice committed by one party against the other is the main reason for the prohibition of usurious contracts. The bank interest in a savings account does not lead to injustice, which is mentioned in the Qur'an as the reason for prohibiting usurious contracts. But the interest is still included within ribā al-fadl. This analysis leads Riḍā to say that, based on Ibn al-Qayyim's theorization, if there is extreme need in modern Muslims societies to such transactions, they can be permitted based on the principle of hāja. However, Riḍā insists that 'Abduh's fatwā to legalize bank interest on savings accounts was issued after 'Abduh asked the relevant authorities to invest the saved money in a legitimate business, and therefore the savings can be regarded as a form of investment and not a loan to the bank. Riḍā adds that during the last few years of 'Abduh's career as Egypt's muftī, his relationship with the Khedive had deteriorated. The Khedive's supporters spread a rumor that 'Abduh has given a fatwā to legitimize ribā without mentioning his attempt to reform the bank system in a way that makes saving accounts totally legitimate in Islamic law.91

ON ACCEPTING EVIDENCE IN COURT BASED ON A TELEGRAPHIC MESSAGE

In fatwā 98, Riḍā received a question that inquired about the validity of using a telegraphic message as evidence in court.92 He replies first by declaring that most contemporary judges do not accept a statement of a witness in a lawsuit received through a telegraphic message, just as they do not accept written documents. Rather, they strictly require that witnesses must be present in person in front of the judge. Riḍā then argues that "if we go back to the fundamentals of the Qur'an, sunna, and the hikam of the shari'a, we know that evidence (bayyina) includes everything which helps to establish truth in a way that the judge trusts." He adds that the current government sends telegraphic messages on a continuous basis to their agents as a way of instruction. Merchants make deals with each other through such messages. This is a clear proof that it is considered a trusted way of communication. Therefore, it should be included within judicial practices.

On Listening to Singing and Playing Musical Instruments

Riḍā received several questions in his fatwās section of the Manār about the legality of singing and playing musical instruments. Many traditionalist jurists strictly prohibited singing, especially if accompanied by musical instruments. The prohibition is based on several hadīths and on traditions of early religious authorities. In fatwā 185, Riḍā first enlists most of the hadīths and early traditions about the case. He then concludes that the number of sound hadīths that permit singing is actually larger than those prohibiting the practice. But even if there are some sound hadīths that prohibit singing and playing musical instruments, this is because such practices were associated, during the time of the Prophet, with drinking wine and committing great sins. He quotes in his fatwā Ghazzālī’s Iḥyā’, in which the latter’s reasoning is similar to that of Riḍā. Ghazzālī argues that “the reason for prohibiting the use of certain musical instruments, such as the ’ūd and mizzmūr, is because they were associated with the gatherings of drinking wine. On the contrary, tabl and duff were permitted in the ḥadīth because they were mostly used during weddings.” Ghazzālī continues his argumentation by noting that “God has permitted every good thing (tayyībāt) except if the permission leads to mischief. The sounds played by musical instruments are not prohibited to listen to because of their quality as musical intonations. If this is the case, then listening to the singing of birds must be prohibited. The prohibition, therefore, has to be for other reasons, which is the association with gatherings in which great sins are committed.” Riḍā depends on Ghazzālī’s analysis to argue that if the use of any kind of musical instruments is not associated with sinful actions, then there is no harm in permitting listening to singing and music, on the condition that it should not lead to indulgence that affects one’s remembrance of God or his/her recitation of the Qur’ān. Riḍā concludes that “every action that is harmful to religion, mind, self, property, or honor is prohibited, and there is no prohibited action that is not harmful.” It is clear that Riḍā’s fatwā, and his legal interpretation of singing and music, reflects his interest in considering the reasoning behind the prohibition and consequently deciding the application of the legal rule accordingly.

Rashīd Rīḍā and Maqāsid al-Sharī‘a

On the Dissolution of a Marriage Contract due to Previously Unknown Mental or Physical Defect in the Husband or Wife

In fatwā 539, Riḍā replies to a question concerning a matter of disagreement among the Sunnī schools of jurisprudence. The question is, if the newly married husband or wife discover that his/her partner suffers from an illness such as a skin disease or insanity, can the contract be dissolved accordingly? The jurists agree that if there is a condition, related to the physical appearance or health of the wife, for example, which is stated in the contract, then the husband has the right to dissolve the contract. But if there is no stated condition in the contract, and after the conclusion of it, a defect appeared in the husband or the wife, then the disagreement is on the legality of invalidating the contract through divorce. For Zāhirīte jurists, such as Dāwūd al-Zāhirī (d. 270/884) and Ibn Ḥazm (d. 456/1064), the contract cannot be dissolved because there is no clear Qur’ānic text or a ḥadīth which permits such an action. The Ḥanafites and Shāfi‘ites each included only specific defects and not others. The established Ḥanbalite opinion includes more possible health problems than both the Ḥanafites and Shāfi‘ites but is also limited to a specific number. The reasoning behind the disagreement is that the evidence mainly comes from opinions of the Companions and whether one can make qiyyās to add more defects or health problems to the list. However, the enquirer who addressed the question to Riḍā was concerned about whether one can also include diseases and permanent health problems that have become well-known and documented in modern medicine but were not known to medieval jurists. Riḍā’s view is that the narrated traditions from the Companions or the Successors, related to the case in question, are based on the main principles of the shari‘a, such as the prevention of deception and negating the acceptance of harming oneself or others (lā ḍarar wa lā ḍirār). Therefore, Riḍā observes, there is no reason to limit the defects to specific instances. What is interesting in this fatwā is that Riḍā quotes Ibn al-Qayyim’s Zād al-Ma‘ād in which the latter explains that « any kind of defect which leads the husband or the wife to stay away from the other, and with its presence the aim (maqṣūd) of marriage, which is the mercy and love between them, will not be achieved, is considered a legitimate reason for the dissolution of the contract. Whoever contemplates maqāsid al-shari‘a through its sources and finds justice, wisdom (ḥikma), and the consideration of maṣalīḥ, would definitely realize that this opinion (on the specific question) is the one that is based on the fundamentals of the shari‘a. »

There are other examples of fatwās in which Riḍā’s opinions largely depend on interpretations of texts or traditions in a way that focus on the role of maqāsid al-shari‘a, such as his opinions on slavery, polygamy, war and peace, and political consultation in Islam. But these are explained previously in the section on maqāsid al-Qur‘ān of Riḍā’s al-Wahy al-Muḥammadi.

As for cases that are not governed by or related to Qur‘ānic verses or Prophetic traditions, there are several fatwās in which Riḍā applies the principle of “bringing benefits and preventing harm.” It all depends on whether an action is considered of benefit to the Muslim community or not. The guiding principle for Riḍā, as stated before, is that in mu‘āmalât every action or practice is considered valid unless proved to be harmful. In such a case of harm, a prohibition can be declared but is not considered a religious one. A clear example of Riḍā’s prohibition of an action, based on its harmful effect, is his opinion on smoking and consuming drugs such as morphine. He declares in fatwā 576 that in matters related to drinking and eating, everything that God created is permitted for use except those stated in the Qur‘ān or sunna. There are no texts that rule specifically on smoking cigarettes or injecting morphine to the body. But a jurist can depend on the general principles of the shari‘a, such as the one stated in the hadith “lā darar wa lā dirār,” that whatever action that causes harm to the body must be prohibited.

Conclusion

This article has analyzed Riḍā’s conception of maqāsid al-shari‘a by examining his theoretical works and some of his fatwās in order to see how his line of thought is compared to traditional theorization and legal opinions of Sunni Muslim jurists. I argue in this article that Rida’s emphasis on maslahta is a component of his understanding of the legal aims intended by the Lawgiver. His conception of maqasid al-shari’a stems from his interpretation of the Qur’anic text. This interpretation is very much free from the limitation of traditional commentaries but it is committed to the linguistic content of the Qur’an. If the Qur’anic text explains itself clearly without heavy dependence on extra-Qur’anic material, including Prophetic traditions, then one has to focus more on the idea of how the Qur’an interprets itself. Here, Rida resorts to the “thematic” method in which all or most of the verses that pertain to a specific topic can be collected and analyzed in a way that seeks harmony among their meanings. But despite the primacy of the Qur’an at the expense of other legal sources, Rida’s legal theorization allows a secondary role for Prophetic traditions and other levels of scholarly traditions. It is worth noting that Rida reminds his readers that the juristic schools disagreed on the question of the revelatory nature of Prophetic traditions. However, Rida does not clearly announce his position, although he calls for applying all sound hadiths by virtue of their probable authenticity but insists on their secondary role to the Qur’an.

This article, therefore, responds to the claim made by Kerr and Hallaq that the focus on maslahta in Rida’s legal thought is in fact a point of departure from traditional legal theorization in which Rida’s legal interpretation becomes more “distant” from the texts of the Qur’an and hadith. This has been done in two ways according to Kerr and Hallaq. First, in the legal cases that are regulated by textual rulings, the literal meaning and legal value of the text are ignored for the favor of necessity and need. Second, for the novel cases that have no ruling in the Qur’an or hadith, ijma’ and qiyas are suspended and maslahta is elevated to become the prominent source instead. My response to Kerr and Hallaq’s line of theorization is expressed in this article on two levels, textual and non-textual. On the textual level, I have argued that Rida’s focus on the legal content of Qur’anic and hadith texts reflects his interest in the legal aims or the maqasid of the rulings as part of the maqasid of the Qur’an. Necessity and need come into the discussion only when interpreting Qur’anic verses that clearly allow for taking necessity and need into consideration. Rida views this resort to the case of necessity or need as part of maqasid al-shar’i’a. Rida bases his view on some medieval juristic opinions that generalized the principle of necessity to possibly include cases of prohibition not mentioned in the Qur’an as suspended for the existence of necessity such as eating forbidden food.
Riḍā’s fatwā that legitimizes using alcoholic drug for medication, for instance, is based on the principle of necessity. Deciding the existence of necessity is based on Riḍā’s assessment that there is no non-alcoholic medication available and the fact that one of the primary legal aims of the shari‘a is to preserve life. As for Riḍā’s view on slavery, he sees the Qur‘ān as encouraging freeing slaves and hence expressing the spirit of Islam, which is to free slaves.

As for the area of legal activity that is not governed by texts, I tried to show that although maslaha is prominent in Riḍā’s interpretation, its legitimacy stems from Qur‘ānic verses that call for the consideration of maslaha in the sense that in mu‘āmalāt, the aim of the Lawgiver is to achieve the public good. In terms of the commitment to the classical doctrines of legal theorization, Riḍā’s line of thought against ijmā‘ and qiyās is based on his view that there are no clear Qur‘ānic or hadith references to the commitment to the scholarly consensus or analogy as the only two legal sources after the Qur‘ān and hadith. In addition, he finds in his reading of the Qur‘ān a clear call to consider the public good which is described as whatever brings benefit to individuals and the community at large and prevent harm and danger. The highest legal aims in Riḍā’s theorization are taken from Shāfi‘ī, which are the preservation of religion, life, mind, offspring, and honor. Other intermediate aims that lead to the final aims include justice and equality.

As for the case of interest on saving accounts, Riḍā interprets Abduh’s fatwā of permission as based on ḥāja (need) and not darūra (necessity). It is important to know that although Riḍā’s legal theorization might not be clearly expressed in classical Sunnī theorization, he is committed to the general meanings of the Qur‘ānic text. He also argues that even isolated hadiths in mu‘āmalāt ought to be applied if they have sound chains of authorities but on the condition first that they should not contradict the Qur‘ān, and second that the application itself must achieve the public good based on the evidence from Qur‘ānic and hadith texts that call for this consideration and regard it as part of maqāṣid al-shari‘a. This understanding gives Riḍā the right to challenge certain traditional views based on what he thinks of as the spirit of revelation.
