Program Notes

This work transfigures the various moments of the life of Moses as they are narrated in the Book of Exodus. In the events of this man’s life there is something inherent in the substance of our time. As with Michelangelo’s Moses, described in the text that Freud dedicated to this work, the prophet of monotheism is presented here as a man, forced to react when faced with the difficulties that this God—without name and without image—puts before him: the abandonment of his newborn body in the waters of the Nile, the mystery of the burning bush in which the blinding splendor of the glory of YHWH—in the kabod—manifests itself, and the 40 days passed on Mount Sinai where he receives the tablets of the law only to discover, on his return, the golden calf erected and venerated by his people.

The character Moses is dissolved across the scenes, disregarding biographical narration to extend itself over concepts, sentiments, and premonitions of a revelation that acts now, in our time. Moses is brought closer to the spectator’s gaze, embodied in every element of the performance, which is conceived in tableaus and fragments; psychic vibrations that emerge like ripples across the space-time of life, at once routine and obscurely perceived as an exile.

The title evokes the famous spiritual sung by the slaves of America, who identified themselves with the Judaic people, a presage of their return to Africa. The Israelites, able to return from their exile in Babylonia and—thanks to Moses—from their slavery in Egypt, were the symbol of the American slaves’ release. Additionally, it may mean the condition of our slavery incorporeal, exiled from being.

Two images, ultimately, channel and guide this long performance, like the two faces of the same coin: the burning bush, which represents the true image and negates any and all representation—“I am he who I am”—and the golden calf, which instead portrays the false image, the one that illustrates this same phrase. All that lies between is the object of this work.

—Romeo Castellucci
Translated by Brent Waterhouse

In Go down, Moses, we are offered the spectacle of the descent of man into the dark cavern, where the human hand forms the first hand-print, the image-matrix in the history of mankind, and conceives the original staging of the world.
The Mother constitutes the central figure of the performance. In contrast to the patriarchal viewpoint of the Old Testament, according to which Moses represents the Father, Romeo Castellucci proposes a reverse, feminine reading of the Biblical Exodus, highlighting the primeval primary bond between mother and body, a body born or a body decomposed. He connects this indissoluble relation with the quintessence of artistic creation, as femininity surrounds human life from birth to burial, from the mystery of gestation up to the dead man’s wake. The feminine principle is meant as a pure receptive matter, as a reservoir of creation. It is the place from which man emerges through childbirth and where he returns after death, a place that remains stable even after the destruction of biological life.

The forced exit of a baby from the body of a woman in a public toilet evokes the Exodus of the Jewish people and the idea of liberation from slavery: “Oppressed so hard, they could not stand—let my people go.” The slavery of the Jews, the slavery of the blacks in America resound in unison with our own—invisible—submission to the spectacle of the modern world. But the people “don’t know yet that they are a people, because they don’t know yet that they are slaves,” the mother claims. We are spectators, and at the same time viewing objects of a permanent voyeuristic spectacle, slaves of a streaming of endlessly repeated, univocal images, which invade our consciousness and usurp our existence.

The question arises, then, what does it mean “to see”? The theater of Romeo Castellucci attempts to activate the ability of seeing through its functioning as a cut-off switch of this endless stream of images. It awakens the spectator and brings to the level of consciousness the platonic idea of an exit from the cave. Naked and frightened, man will grope his way out to an unknown and unpredictable world. He will be exposed to the light, and to the constant threat of the gaze, just like the baby when it is forced to abandon the protective darkness of the womb. In his painful Exodus, who will be his guide? Who will smash the golden calf? Who will help him to free himself from the bondage of fake idols?

About the Artist

Romeo Castellucci (Direction, Set, Costumes, Lights, Text) was born in 1960 in Cesena, Italy. He graduated with a degree in painting and scenography from the Academy of Fine Arts in Bologna. In 1981, with Claudia Castellucci and Chiara Guidi, he founded Societas Raffaello Sanzio. Since then he has produced numerous performances, working as writer and director as well as designing the sets, lights, sound, and costumes. He is internationally recognized—his works having been staged in over fifty countries—for his theater based on a synthesis of the arts aimed at creating an integrated perception. He has also written various theoretical essays that reflect the development of his conception of theater. His directing style is marked by dramatic lines not subject to the primacy of literature, making of theater a plastic art, complex and richly visionary. Since 2006 he has been working individually. His stagings are regularly invited to the world’s most prestigious theaters, opera houses, and festivals.

In 2010, Castellucci started the project that led to On the Concept of the Face, Regarding the Son of God and The Minster’s Black Veil. In 2012 he completed this project with The Four Seasons Restaurant, presented in July 2012 at Festival d’Avignon.

In 2011 Castellucci produced Richard Wagner’s Parsifal, his first opera, at Théâtre La Monnaie–De Munt in Brussels. That year he was also selected by the Tokyo Festival to present The phenomenon called I. In 2013 he was invited by Thomas Ostermeier, director of Schaubhüne in Berlin, to produce a new creation, Hyperion by Frederic Hölderlin. In July of the same year, he presented Schwanengesang D744 at the Festival d’Avignon. This new opera, coproduced by La Monnaie–De Munt, was based on a selection of Schubert Lieder sung by Kerstin Avemo, with the participation of Valérie Dréville and Alain Franco.

In 2014 the city of Bologna’s Assessorato alla Cultura dedicated that year’s special project, titled and the fox said to the crow, to Castellucci.
