2013

From Sound Bites to Sound Learning: Engaging One-Click Kids in Long-Term Study

Jessica Rosevear
High School English Teacher

Follow this and additional works at: https://digitalcommons.montclair.edu/nj-english-journal

Recommended Citation
Available at: https://digitalcommons.montclair.edu/nj-english-journal/vol2/iss1/9

This Article is brought to you for free and open access by Montclair State University Digital Commons. It has been accepted for inclusion in New Jersey English Journal by an authorized editor of Montclair State University Digital Commons. For more information, please contact digitalcommons@montclair.edu.
From Sound Bites to Sound Learning: Engaging One-Click Kids in Long-Term Study

Today’s youth are accustomed to getting information in digestible, sound bites; short and sweet Twitter updates instead of the rambling emails of yesteryear, YouTube clips instead of hour-long TV episodes, typing a question into Google and clicking on the first answer instead of conducting authentic research. Arguably, this one-click culture has the power to chip at students’ interest, and maybe even ability, to invest in the long-term commitment required to learn something deeply.

This becomes especially problematic for English teachers guiding students through literature that requires time and perseverance to comprehend, analyze, and truly appreciate the works studied. Many students won’t understand Macbeth’s dagger soliloquy at a first perusal. There’s a time commitment involved in reading the passage, re-reading it, breaking apart complicated phrasing, looking up unfamiliar words in the footnotes or dictionary, and interpreting and analyzing for meaning. What are some ways we, as English teachers, can motivate students to engage in this type of process learning when the larger culture has accustomed youngsters to getting information pre-processed in neat, pretty bundles? Here are some ideas:

1) Model close reading strategies by breaking long passages into small bits that students can read and digest.

Looking at an entire page of Shakespearean language can intimidate many students. Analyzing a lengthy passage line by line, bit by bit, will help make the task of analysis more manageable. When tackling a complicated monologue, for example, I like to project the text on the board and use the highlight tool in Word to focus the students’ attention to a single line or phrase. Using color to isolate small, specific lines and even single words helps students to focus on individual elements of a passage, as opposed to looking at an entire page and becoming visually overwhelmed. In particular, I’ve found this technique to be especially helpful for capturing the attention of students who are easily distracted. Using neon colors, where appropriate, helps bring their attention back to the central idea.

2) Mix up the order to give kids the big picture.

When I teach the Prince’s monologue in Act One, Scene One of Shakespeare’s The Tragedy of Romeo and Juliet, I start by having the students read the passage aloud. Since Romeo and Juliet is typically the first Shakespearean text students are exposed to in my district, and this speech is one of the first monologues in the play, students may become quickly overwhelmed by the extended poetic language and euphemisms. After the students read, I repeat the “three civil brawls” line. “‘Three civil brawls, bred of an airy word... have thrice disturbed the quiet of our streets,’” I quote to them. “What could this mean?” By drawing their attention to the heart of the monologue—the essential “sound bite”—students are less likely to feel encumbered by the rest of the passage. When they comprehend that line, it gives some context for understanding the rest of the text. Grasping the heart of the passage first, even if it means starting your analysis in the middle of it, will break the ice for understanding the monologue as a whole.

3) Start with quick, easy concepts and build up to larger ones.

I like to start a new concept by instilling confidence in the students with simple questions. Saying to a class, “Raise your hand if you’ve ever meditated,” for instance, might hook students into what will eventually grow into a much more complicated discussion of Siddhartha’s experience of meditation in Hermann Hesse’s Siddhartha. Starting with more complicated ideas—“What does Hesse mean when he writes that Siddhartha 'becomes the heron' when he meditates?“—is harder for students, and getting a discussion flowing might be easier by having them respond to more innocuous concepts that will prime them for those bigger topics. Getting in on the ground floor with a friendly, “are you somewhat familiar with this general idea?” type of question invites students into the area you’ll be discussing. This technique is especially great for building confidence in shyer students so that they eventually feel comfortable delving into deeper critical questions.
Jessica Rosevear

4) Use their love of technology to advance from familiar to unfamiliar territory.

Jessica Rosevear is a high school English teacher in New Jersey. She edits the independent literary journal Killing the Angel (www.killingtheangel.com).

On Repeatedly Rereading Shelley’s Frankenstein

Much have I cover’d in the English class,
And many weighty texts and tests assigned;
Through rough drafts of essays have I opined
Which students in good faith have writ en masse.
Oft to one fine novel had I giv’n thought
That ill-fated Shelley wrote as her chore;
Yet did I never love its frame structure
Till I re-read the text each time I taught:
Then felt I like some scientist gone wild
When grand ideas arise and must be born;
Or like a new-made creature, fashioned mild
And warped by cruelty—who becomes forlorn
For all men hate the wretched and defiled
Pondering pages from a journal torn.

- Vanessa Rasmussen

Vanessa Rasmussen is enjoying her sixth year of teaching English at Vineland High School, where she has taught juniors and seniors in a range of courses, from basic skills classes to Honors classes, and is the advisor of the Student Literature Club. She is also an Adjunct Professor of English at Rowan University. She was awarded the M. Jerry Weiss Early Career Teacher Scholarship Award by the New Jersey Council of Teachers of English in 2011.