Stephen King's newest novel, Firestarter, involves a secretive government agency and a young couple who kidnaps guinea pigs to create a spine tingling chiller.

The story centers on a young couple, Andy and Vicky, who meet at a drug store where both have volunteered to be human guinea pigs for an experiment called Lot 6, run by a government agency called The Shop. They want to test a mild hallucinogenic drug they assure everyone is safe.

Little does this young couple know that hardly anything is known of this drug or its effects on people. The proof comes in the horrible results of the experiment, during which one subject tears his eyes out, while another lapses into a coma. Many of these subjects eventually die or go insane, but the project is hushed up.

As the story progresses, Vicky and Andy marry and realize that as a result of the drug, they possess certain mental powers. Vicky finds she can open doors by looking at them and concentrating, while Andy, whose power is stronger, can push people to make them believe or see certain things by willing to do so.

Soon, they have more power than who also possesses a strange but dangerous talent; she is able to set objects on fire. Andy, concentrating on them. As a child, she sees the bedclothes and stuffed animals on fire because her mother is afraid that once she unleashes her power, she will burn her. At the same time, however, she becomes angry. When she is upset or irritated, her ability turns off and she feels like a fury, and anyone around her could be its victim.

With no discipline from her parents, she learns to control her habit, but the ability to lash out remains within her. She is also eternally afraid of her father when they discover they've been under surveillance by The Shop, who wants Charlie for her special powers.

One day when Andy, an English teacher, is at school, he has a strange feeling of deja vu. Determined to find out what is happening, Rushing home, he finds Vicky has been killed. Her fingernails have been trimmed, and she has been concentrating on them. As a child, she set her bedclothes and stuffed animals on fire because her mother is afraid of what will happen. Rushing home, he finds Vicky has been killed. Her fingernails have been trimmed, and she has been concentrating on them. As a child, she set her bedclothes and stuffed animals on fire because her mother is afraid that with her power, they could be its victim.

With the help of her husband, who also possesses a strange but dangerous talent; she is able to set objects on fire. Andy, concentrating on them. As a child, she sees the bedclothes and stuffed animals on fire because her mother is afraid that once she unleashes her power, she will burn her. At the same time, however, she becomes angry. When she is upset or irritated, her ability turns off and she feels like a fury, and anyone around her could be its victim.

With no discipline from her parents, she learns to control her habit, but the ability to lash out remains within her. She is also eternally afraid of her father when they discover they've been under surveillance by The Shop, who wants Charlie for her special powers.

One day when Andy, an English teacher, is at school, he has a strange feeling of deja vu. Determined to find out what is happening, Rushing home, he finds Vicky has been killed. Her fingernails have been trimmed, and she has been concentrating on them. As a child, she set her bedclothes and stuffed animals on fire because her mother is afraid that with her power, they could be its victim.

With no discipline from her parents, she learns to control her habit, but the ability to lash out remains within her. She is also eternally afraid of her father when they discover they've been under surveillance by The Shop, who wants Charlie for her special powers.

One day when Andy, an English teacher, is at school, he has a strange feeling of deja vu. Determined to find out what is happening, Rushing home, he finds Vicky has been killed. Her fingernails have been trimmed, and she has been concentrating on them. As a child, she set her bedclothes and stuffed animals on fire because her mother is afraid that with her power, they could be its victim.

With no discipline from her parents, she learns to control her habit, but the ability to lash out remains within her. She is also eternally afraid of her father when they discover they've been under surveillance by The Shop, who wants Charlie for her special powers.

One day when Andy, an English teacher, is at school, he has a strange feeling of deja vu. Determined to find out what is happening, Rushing home, he finds Vicky has been killed. Her fingernails have been trimmed, and she has been concentrating on them. As a child, she set her bedclothes and stuffed animals on fire because her mother is afraid that with her power, they could be its victim.

With no discipline from her parents, she learns to control her habit, but the ability to lash out remains within her. She is also eternally afraid of her father when they discover they've been under surveillance by The Shop, who wants Charlie for her special powers.

One day when Andy, an English teacher, is at school, he has a strange feeling of deja vu. Determined to find out what is happening, Rushing home, he finds Vicky has been killed. Her fingernails have been trimmed, and she has been concentrating on them. As a child, she set her bedclothes and stuffed animals on fire because her mother is afraid that with her power, they could be its victim.

With no discipline from her parents, she learns to control her habit, but the ability to lash out remains within her. She is also eternally afraid of her father when they discover they've been under surveillance by The Shop, who wants Charlie for her special powers.

One day when Andy, an English teacher, is at school, he has a strange feeling of deja vu. Determined to find out what is happening, Rushing home, he finds Vicky has been killed. Her fingernails have been trimmed, and she has been concentrating on them. As a child, she set her bedclothes and stuffed animals on fire because her mother is afraid that with her power, they could be its victim.

With no discipline from her parents, she learns to control her habit, but the ability to lash out remains within her. She is also eternally afraid of her father when they discover they've been under surveillance by The Shop, who wants Charlie for her special powers.

One day when Andy, an English teacher, is at school, he has a strange feeling of deja vu. Determined to find out what is happening, Rushing home, he finds Vicky has been killed. Her fingernails have been trimmed, and she has been concentrating on them. As a child, she set her bedclothes and stuffed animals on fire because her mother is afraid that with her power, they could be its victim.

With no discipline from her parents, she learns to control her habit, but the ability to lash out remains within her. She is also eternally afraid of her father when they discover they've been under surveillance by The Shop, who wants Charlie for her special powers.

One day when Andy, an English teacher, is at school, he has a strange feeling of deja vu. Determined to find out what is happening, Rushing home, he finds Vicky has been killed. Her fingernails have been trimmed, and she has been concentrating on them. As a child, she set her bedclothes and stuffed animals on fire because her mother is afraid that with her power, they could be its victim.

With no discipline from her parents, she learns to control her habit, but the ability to lash out remains within her. She is also eternally afraid of her father when they discover they've been under surveillance by The Shop, who wants Charlie for her special powers.

One day when Andy, an English teacher, is at school, he has a strange feeling of deja vu. Determined to find out what is happening, Rushing home, he finds Vicky has been killed. Her fingernails have been trimmed, and she has been concentrating on them. As a child, she set her bedclothes and stuffed animals on fire because her mother is afraid that with her power, they could be its victim.

With no discipline from her parents, she learns to control her habit, but the ability to lash out remains within her. She is also eternally afraid of her father when they discover they've been under surveillance by The Shop, who wants Charlie for her special powers.

One day when Andy, an English teacher, is at school, he has a strange feeling of deja vu. Determined to find out what is happening, Rushing home, he finds Vicky has been killed. Her fingernails have been trimmed, and she has been concentrating on them. As a child, she set her bedclothes and stuffed animals on fire because her mother is afraid that with her power, they could be its victim.

With no discipline from her parents, she learns to control her habit, but the ability to lash out remains within her. She is also eternally afraid of her father when they discover they've been under surveillance by The Shop, who wants Charlie for her special powers.