Specialization is a problem in liberal arts colleges

By Warren Thomas

Liberal arts colleges have failed to satisfy the needs of faculty and students according to Dr. Donald N. Levine, Dean of the College, University of Chicago, and the keynote speaker at the second annual Presidential Fall Symposium held Thurs., Oct. 24.

A major reason Levine cited for this failure has been the growing tendency toward premature specialization in which students concentrate much earlier on studies relating to their major, depriving them of a broad-based education.

Levine admitted that premature specialization is understandable given the pressures of society, where students are induced to develop marketable skills much earlier in order to succeed in a more competitive job market.

Levine also criticized the specialized curriculum of many college liberal arts departments for being too rigid. "I haven't the slightest doubt that it is impossible to mount a truly fine liberal arts program within the confines of a department. They're just inadequate to provide a quality liberal arts education," he said.

In 1982, a photograph entitled "Bagel Ear Muffs" by MSC photography major Maggie McDermott, won grand prize in Lenders Bagel's National Contest. As part of the award, Lenders donated a $250 scholarship to MSC. The MSC Art Department is now offering this scholarship/grant to an undergraduate photography student to fund ongoing work or initiate new projects.

Members of the administration, faculty, and students confronted the moral problem on campus in the "Faculty Burnout and Student Blues" workshop at the Presidential Fall Symposium on Oct. 24.

Moderators, Dr. Rita Jacobs of the English department and SGA legislator Jack Lyons led the discussion. Concerning faculty burnout, professors addressed such issues as: financial problems, the pressures and demands of heavy workloads, difficulties in teaching students with different intellectual backgrounds, restrictions of a standard grading system, boredom linked with teaching repetitive courses, and the lack of community and sensitivity among faculty and students.

Commenting on the difficulties of a standard grading system, Prof. Ed Persson of the music department said, "It is hard to draw the line. You and I know that we need some sort of standard grading system, but it is hard to draw the line. And I think that much back from the students." Rich noted that the combined energies of the teacher and students produces "synergy." As a result of this synergy, both parties leave the classroom fulfilled.

Dealing with the issue of student blues, the group discussed problems with communication between faculty and students, feelings of humiliation stemming from a lack of respect from the teacher, and indifference of fellow students.

Levine also expressed dissatisfaction with the philosophy of many American colleges which concentrate solely on teaching students technical skills, ignoring moral development. He pointed out that this philosophy was first proposed by Cardinal John Henry Newman and was adopted overwhelmingly by American colleges since the beginning of this century.

Levine condemned this philosophy of teaching as being ineffective in helping students become competent and independent learners. "One thing I'm clear about is that the lecture method has to go," he said. "I just think about how you feel when coming to my lecture. You and I know that we have self-respect, you are projecting self-respect. If you expect a lot, you will get that much back from the students." Rich noted that the combined energies of the teacher and students produces "synergy." As a result of this synergy, both parties leave the classroom fulfilled.

Therefore, this issue not only lies inside the organization, but within it. Student Judy Chidiac said, "Students know what the teacher expects from them. It's sort of a self-fulfilling prophecy."

Once the issues of faculty burnout and student blues were recognized, the group formulated some possible answers. Some of these solutions included: the faculty get involved in special activities to benefit their department, a required faculty rotation among courses, more faculty-student activity on both social and academic levels, and that students find the courage and responsibility to seek individual attention from teachers.

Alcohol Awareness week focuses on the hazards of alcohol abuse informing MSC students of the hazards of alcohol abuse was the main goal of last week's fourth annual Alcohol Awareness Week. This program, sponsored by James Harris, assistant dean of students, also encouraged a more responsible attitude concerning the consumption of alcohol.

By Tom Boud

"The purpose of this program is to make our students and the public more aware of what alcohol really is," Harris said. "Many people drink without truly realizing what could happen as a result from overindulgence. For example, many students don't know that alcohol is related to 90 percent of the fights and brawls which occur on campus."

Harris said that many of the problems with alcohol occur at unsupervised campus parties. "The tailgate parties should be more cautiously conducted," Harris said. "The parking lots are always open to virtually anyone who wants to party, making it extremely difficult to enforce the drinking age of 21."

Also, there are not enough police officers and security personnel to keep an eye on every single party which further undermines the need for more student responsibility.

According to Harris, the Clove Road Apts. are also a source of alcohol related problems.

"The Clove Road Apartments have been very problematic this year because outsiders, other college students and local high school students, hang out there in disorderly groups looking for trouble," he said. "This doesn't create a favorable image for the college."

Dr. Edward Martin, associate dean of student affairs, supported Harris' program, which included an Alcohol Awareness saying, "Our students must exercise discretion when inviting people to their parties. A great deal of trouble is caused by visitors who come to get drunk and harm others."

Martin advised all students to know exactly who attends their parties and to beware of any uninvited strangers. "Being aware of this problem is very important," he said. "Because many students trust any stranger regardless of how dangerous he might be."

Martin also stated that MSC can be held responsible for the alcohol related death of any student who is served alcoholic beverages on campus.

"If an intoxicated person, who is served on campus, happened to get into a fatal accident anywhere off campus, the college could be held legally responsible for that person's death," Martin said. "This is all the more reason why alcohol awareness is essential for everyone."

However, Martin added that he has confidence in MSC students regarding responsible drinking behavior.

"The free conduct of the student body during the previous homecoming celebrations demonstrates that they definitely have the ability to behave in a prudent and responsible manner," Martin said.

Following the keynote address, six workshops were held to discuss various ways of improving the quality of life at MSC. Recommendations were presented at the symposium's closing session.

Health Professions bill approved

By Oren Zeve

The SGA legislature approved a bill appropriating $994.30 to the Health Professions Association, a class two organization, for its annual health fair at last night’s meeting.

The decision came after a debate over a clause in last year’s bill for the health fair requiring that the group pay for 50 percent of the cost, beginning in 1985.

Members of Health Professions were unaware of the requirement and believed that they were unfairly being singled out, especially since the fair had been successful for the past ten years. Legislators in favor of the 50 percent cap on the appropriation thought the limit was reasonable due to the SGA’s usual guidelines, regardless of last year’s requirement.

The legislature decided to provide full funding of this year’s request with the 50 percent limit to be adhered to in the future, based upon notification to the club’s executive board and faculty advisor. The fair will be held on Wed., Nov. 6.

In another appropriations bill, the International Student Organization, a class two organization, was allotted $545.30 for a reception for President Donald Walters and his wife, and Mrs. Roland Garrett. Mrs. Garrett will be the new Director of the International Student Program.

The organization seeks to establish better communication between American students and the visiting foreign students. They also hope to develop a stronger international curriculum on campus.

In other news, the legislature approved $325 from the MTA account for a bus to Trenton State College for Saturday’s football game. The tickets will be available on Friday morning, at a cost of $3 for the bus and $2.50 for admission to the game.

Also, the legislature reviewed the Jewish Student Unions class three charter.

SGA President Dave Handel congratulated Class One Concerts on their fine production of the Hooters’ concert Tuesday night. He reminded students that the Board of Trustees will meet next Thurs., Nov. 7 in Room 419 of the Student Center.

Law school day draws sixty reps from around the nation

By Lisa Nelson

Sixty law schools were represented at the Law School Admissions Day, sponsored by the Pre-Law Society of the SGA, the Center for Legal Studies, and the Student Paralegal Association of the SGA held Oct. 23 at MSC.

Representatives from these schools offered advice, answered questions, and provided literature and applications to 450 prospective law students.

In addition, there were two panel discussions, “Choosing a Law School” and “Applying to Law School: Financial Aid, the Personal Statement, and the Admissions Process,” as well as information on the Law School Admissions Test (LSAT).

In the first lecture, the panel discussed factors involved in choosing a law school. Among those to be considered are: geographic area, the physical setting of the school and surrounding community, the availability and desirability of housing, and the availability of public transportation.

Other factors included the size of the entering class, the opportunity for part-time employment, placement statistics, the prestige and quality of the institution, the institution’s ability to serve personal educational needs and goals, and the net overall cost.

Discussing the personal statement, one representative of Harvard said, “The personal statement and records are very important. The essay should be well thought out. The LSAT scores, grades, law experience, activities outside school, as well as inside school, and any job held are important also.”

Financial aid is available through loans, grants, scholarships and Law School Guaranteed Access Programs. In order to be considered for financial aid, one needs to take the LSAT. A registration packet is available in the Center for Legal Studies.

The Center offers a Paralegal Studies Program, which is the only four-year program in NJ that is approved by the American Bar Association, and Pre-Law Studies program. Both programs are offered as minors. The Center also provides counseling and information for students interested in law.

For the third consecutive year, this event was made possible through a grant from the Aaron and Rachel Meyer Memorial Foundation. Preparation for the event was a combined effort of students and faculty under the direction of Dr. Marilyn Franken, the director of the Center for Legal Studies. Assistance was provided by Judy Rosenbush, student assistant in Legal Studies and vice-president of the Paralegal Student Association.

Of the event, John Navarro, a member of the Pre-Law Society said, “It gives a person a variety of schools to look at and the representatives give good information.”

Junior Kari Reidel said, “This is my third year here. For someone like me planning to go to law school this is a great experience. You can speak with the people who will be judging you.”

Many law school representatives said that this law day was one of the finest and best attended events in the kind in the country.

Students concentrating on majors are deprived of broader education

The problems of education in liberal arts colleges were discussed at MSC’s 2nd Annual Presidential Fall Symposium, held Oct. 24. The keynote speaker, Dr. Donald N. Levine, touched on many important issues in his speech.

A major issue addressed was the failure of liberal arts colleges to provide a broad-based education for students. Levine felt that students enter a major too quickly and then concentrate on it to the extent that they deprive themselves of the chance to study other areas as well.

The reason Levine cited this is because of pressure on students to develop marketable skills to secure future employment. This is without doubt a sign of our times.

Hardly anyone studies for the sheer pleasure of learning anymore. More often, a student enters college with an eye towards becoming a saleable commodity, rather than a well-rounded, educated person, though many might not like to think of themselves in this manner.

But this is totally understandable when job market pressures and competitiveness for positions is taken into consideration. Although we may feel that a good education should never take a back seat to the almighty dollar, the reality of our times often causes just this to occur.

We have no answers for this situation. However, the discussion of this issue, and others raised in the symposium, such as the teaching of critical thinking and the widening of student development to include moral and ethical, rather than solely intellectual growth, is a big step in the right direction.

The more students, faculty, and educational administrators gather to discuss these issues, the greater the chance becomes for gaining valuable insights.
Student angered by recurring bomb scares in dorms

To the editor:

In the Oct. 24, issue of the Montclarion, there were two letters to the editor concerning the conditions in Blanton Hall. This letter is to address an issue that affects almost all 2,000 resident students.

Various reasons can be offered as to why students choose to live on campus, but for the money which is spent by parents, fellow students, or through financial aid, we receive inadequate food service and only adequate housing. Many students have no choice but to live on campus due to the distance between their home and the college. The issue that plagues resident students is bomb scares! There is nothing that the administration, Residence Life staff, students and/or campus police can do about them; this I can understand. I would rather be out of the building when a bomb went off, than inside but it seems to be getting a bit ridiculous when one dorm after another empties out at one or two in the morning only to be followed by another scare. I dread the day when someone decides that this is just another scare and sleeps through it never to wake again because there really was a bomb.

Why do people get their “kicks” by calling in bomb scares? Do they enjoy seeing hundreds of students standing in the cold and knowing that they evacuated the building? Is this a dorm against dorm vendetta, where once one dorm gets a bomb scare and it’s only fair that the others get one? The administration can only reinforce their concern and desire that these scares stop, yet they are not the ones rudely awakened at 2 a.m. to stand in the cold.

At a time when students are taking and studying for midterms, this added aggravation is uncalled for and unjust. An end to these bomb scares is what the resident students need yet we have no control over the solution.

Prof. explains her position on the arm band decision

To the editor:

The Oct. 24 article by Warren Thomas, “Faculty Senate Criticizes Handling of MacConnell Case,” is a clear demonstration of the way the literal use of language and “objective” reporting obscure both truth and intention.

It is true that I introduced the motion regarding black arm bands. It is true that the action of the administration was referred to by some members of the Senate as inappropriate and excessive. However, reporting both of these “facts” in one sentence and omitting the context makes truth invisible and “facts” in one sentence and omitting the context makes truth invisible and “facts” in one sentence and omitting the context makes truth invisible and “facts” in one sentence and omitting the context makes truth invisible and “facts” in one sentence and omitting the context makes truth invisible.

When I introduced the motion, I made it clear that it did not originate with me and that I introduced it reluctantly and after serious consideration of its several implications. Having been given the motion by members of my constituency in the college (I am an at-large senator) and having debated with them the various meanings of the motion, I agreed to introduce it because it is my moral obligation to represent not Adele McCollum but my constituency. It is the only way the faculty at-large holds a voice in the Senate.

What Thomas’s reporting fails to reveal is the pain that this matter has caused to people of goodwill and integrity on both sides of the issue. The historical significance of black arm bands is well-known. Clearly, some of the campus community finds the damage to academic freedom and process brought about by the Summer-fun case, serious enough to warrant some form of public mourning. In this, I willingly represent them.

Gloria to blame for lack of A/C

To the editor:

I’m sorry for the discomfort that residents have been experiencing as the result of the air conditioner malfunctions in Blanton Hall. Hurricane Gloria was responsible for some power outages that knocked it out several weekends ago and may account for the current problem as well.

We call our service company as soon as we are aware of a problem, and the terms of our contract with them bring them in quite quickly. As is obvious to you there are times when the service calls are more frequent than we would like.

Gaining fame, the Hooters aim to please new fans

By Stacey Dunleavy

Not much has changed for the Hooters since their release of "Nervous Night." Of course, they play for larger audiences, they can afford better equipment, but nothing's changed. Or has it?

The Hooters were formed when guitarist/mandolinist Eric Bazilian, keyboardist Rob Hyman and producer Rick Chertoff (sometimes referred to as the "sixth Hooter") met while in college. Hyman, Bazilian and drummer Dave Vosikkinen played in various bands, finally experimenting with reggae and ska, from which was formed the first incarnation of the Hooters.

At that time, Hyman was taking care of all the management chores; he nearly broke under the pressure. They then took a break from performing. During that sabbatical, they worked in the studio with Cyndi Lauper, Hyman co-writing "Time After Time" with her. They also found a manager, a new bassist, and present-day guitarist John Lilley, re-grouped and recorded their first album "Amore."

Lilley described the album as being "disorganized" and lacking musical continuity. Nonetheless, the Hooters made a mark. Unfortunately, they suffered another setback when their bassist was injured in an accident. They recruited Andy King (a former opening act) who is still their present bassist. Finally, they recorded "Nervous Night," performed on Live Aid — and the rest is history.

The Outfield adds spirit to the Hooters concert

By Jim Nicosia and Susan Resnick

The Outfield showed excellent stage presence and motivation that really did "warm up" the crowd for the Hooters.

They opened the concert with "Day By Day," an up-tempo song that had the crowd on their feet immediately and everyone stayed on their feet through the show. Most people seemed to be there to hear "And We Danced" but many old fans, myself included, enjoyed the nostalgic touch of hearing songs such as "No Getting Over You," "Trouble in Paradise," "Concubine," and "Who's That Girl."

It was slightly disappointed with the changes in some of the songs. According to Lilley, most of the changes were for aesthetic reasons. "We're a constantly changing band," he said. "We like to alter older songs to fit newer interests."

This can be called the "Bruce Springsteen Syndrome." This happens when a band or artist suddenly becomes commercially successful, then performs for the newer fans; older fans feel a kind of alienation. This is what I personally felt. Certain songs I remember hearing years ago, when the Hooters played their best, were not included in the show. Bazilian only played sax twice through the whole show. A few days ago, the sax was a more predominant sound.

The use of the mandolin has become more prevalent also, as heard in the cover of "Lucy in the Sky With Diamonds."

Lilley stresses the fact that the Hooters are an American band and he personally feels very patriotic. Touring cross country has heightened this feeling for Lilley. He was amazed at the large variety of people and sights all in one country and the reality of the American "melting pot."

Has this sudden fame changed the Hooters? It doesn't seem that way. They're the same down-to-earth guys who came out of Philadelphia five years ago. Lilley relates: "It's hard to keep your head when people are going crazy over you...we're all secure in our egos that if one of us gets out of hand, someone else can remind him of who we really are."

How about associating with other rock celebrities? "We really don't get star-struck anymore. At Live Aid, we were not that big an act," Lilley felt that the band was lucky to be a part of Live Aid: "It was history...it made the public more aware that people are starving in Africa."

Live Aid was a giant step for a "baby band" about whom organizer Bob Geldof said "Who the... are the Hooters?" He soon found out. Hopefully, if they keep performing as well as they did Tuesday night, more people will find out also.

Tony Lewis

John Spinks

Their album, "Play Deep," has been out twelve weeks, and is "doing great," according to Spinks, selling 70,000 copies in the short span.

"Not bad for complete unknowns," said Lewis. Not bad, indeed, but the band does have something called talent, as well as an air of professionalism that puts them one step up on most newcomers.

For a band that's come such a long way in such a short time, with more exposure and more performances like those at last Tuesday night, great things can be anticipated from The Outfield.

Frat took on WNEW-FM in charity softball game

On October 9, the Tau Kappa Epsilon (TKE) fraternity played a softball game against WNEW-FM. Although TKE lost the game, 32-16, there was something much more at stake.

TKE's main goal in playing the game was to raise money for an MSC sophomore, Susan Arms. Arms suffers from a disease that produces tumors on the brain and spinal column. She is going for her seventeenth major operation in an attempt to improve her situation.

Because of TKE's concern for Arms, the organization raised $1,218.04 through the game. However, they didn't do it alone. TKE received support from sorority Sigma Tau Delta, student government organizations and student activities.

The Jet's Journal

The real success of the event due to the hard work TKE put in the event during the summer months and the students that attended the game. "This showed a sense of caring from the MSC students to a fellow student who needed help and got 100% of it from us," Bruno Paviček said. Paviček was the coordinator of the event.

Arms condition is improving. According to her father, Robert, Susan gains her vision back at times. Her doctors are pleased with her improvement and say there is still hope she will regain her vision.

TKE's efforts show a different side of fraternities. Hopefully it will initiate other organizations to become more involved on the campus.

Anyone interested in finding out more about TKE call Bruno Paviček at 472-6363.
MSC downs CCS, 26-6, avenges last year’s loss

By Perry Schwarz

MSC was out for revenge against Central Connecticut State Saturday night and they got it, dumping CCS, 26-6.

Last year the Indians gained 400 yards in total offense but fell to CCS by a score of 13-7. This year they worked for every point, driving an average of 63 yards for each score.

“We proved that we can play football against them,” said tight end Ed Chavis. Chavis opened the scoring with 6:41 remaining in the first quarter, catching a 31-yard touchdown pass from Walter Briggs.

Tony Colasurdo missed the extra point, but the defense would not let CCS off the hook. The junior quarterback, who came back to the ball and Walt stuck the ball in there, explained. Briggs threw the ball one more time to end MSC’s scoring at 26. He spotted Tony Fleming from 22 yards out. The touchdown pass capped a 62-yard drive.

In addition to his reception, Fleming ran for 88 yards.

MSC did give up one score. CCS’s Matt Skoronski came up with an 87-yard catch with 3:21 left in the game. Co-captain Curtis Gaines felt CCS’s score didn’t take away from the defense. “The CCS score was the result of a broken play,” he said. Gaines came up with the only interception of the game.

According to Giancola, the point of attack geared toward reestablishing the team’s intensity and maintaining it.

The Indians play conference rivals this weekend against the number one tail back.” said Tony Fleming’s another weapon for the Indians’ arsenal

By Anna Sclavo

MSC can no longer be considered a one-dimensional offense thanks to the performance of tailback Tony Fleming.

Fleming has rushed for 646 yards on 139 carries and three touchdowns this season, giving the Indian a potent running attack.

“He’s probably made the difference in our offense. Opposing teams can’t ignore our running game and just play for the pass,” said Head Coach Rick Giancola.

Last season an injury put Fleming out of action. “I was insecure about how things were going to go this year because I didn’t finish last season. I wasn’t sure that I was going to start, but the coaches really gave me a fair shot to play,” he said. “I wasn’t sure about how the guys on the team were going to feel towards me because I didn’t finish last season. But they’ve all been really supportive and that made things a lot easier for me.”

“Tony has had a very positive effect on our football team this year. In camp there was a three-way battle for the tailback spot with Tony, Leroy Horn and James Overby,” said Giancola. All three are quality running backs and I think the competition brought out the best in each of them. Tony emerged from preseason camp as the number one tailback from that point and he’s done everything necessary to remain the number one tail back,” said Giancola.

Last season Fleming was a wide receiver but he feels more comfortable at running back. “I’ve always played that position in high school and I can help the team more at running back than I could at wide receiver. I’m a better runner than receiver and I guess I feel more involved when I run the ball,” commented Fleming.
