Disaster in America
Terrorists Strike World Trade Center, Pentagon

"Make no mistake, the United States will hunt down and punish those responsible for these cowardly acts."
President George W. Bush

The Montclarion will resume our regular production schedule on Thursday, September 20, 2001.

Both Towers have collapsed.
Students stood around campus in tight knit circles, talking in low voices and crying. Others walked listlessly to their next destination, head down, feet shuffling forward, processing the information. Students gathered around the television in the Student Center caféetta watching as smoke billowed around the dilapidated building. Cell phones were passed around without any fear of being stolen; students benevolently sharing their own possessions so that other students could get in touch with loved ones. Others were quietly praying in the SC Quad, searching for the answer to the millions of questions spinning around in their head. Students watched from their residence hall windows in Bohn Hall and the rooftops of Richardson Hall, for 30 minutes away, landmarks being destroyed.

Who would have ever thought that in the year 2001, students would be able to witness something so inconceivable that 20 years later they will be telling their children where they were when it happened?

The Twin Towers are gone. Half of the Pentagon is gone. Whether you just woke up or been in class for hours, you knew when it happened. At 8:45 a.m., a plane hit one tower. Eighteen minutes later, another tower was hit. The Pentagon in Washington D.C. was next, followed by other strategic hits. Half an hour later, there was only dust and smoke. Both towers had collapsed. The NY skyline was empty, no longer the same, because two imposing skyscrapers that tourists, East Coast residents, American citizens, and people around the world had come to distinguish as the defining points of New York City, had vanished into thin air. Lifetime stumps replaced them; the only pieces remaining of what was once an international meeting ground for world trade.

How does one come to terms with such a staggering event? Emotions welled up inside. Anger, sadness, shock, confusion, relief, fear. For the MSU community—students, faculty, and staff—shared these feelings. All were visibly upset, shaking their heads, and just trying to make sense of it all.

"I’m not even sure what to say," said SGA Secretary, Georgia Montdanon. "It’s something I don’t understand. It’s more weird then anything else. I can’t even comprehend." "Honestly, I am speechless. I think right now amongst all the confusion on my mind. I’m trying to think of the families and friends. I’m just trying to make sense of everything while at the same time," said SGA President, Jeannette Mammaro.

For those who thought America was too powerful to experience such a barbaric act, this is a major wake-up call.

"I thought we were totally untouched. I can’t even believe the Twin Towers are gone. Words can’t even explain how I feel right now," said junior Jessica Columbo. "I can’t believe we actually living through this," added senior Jessica Foteo. "This is something you read about in the history books."

Other students summed up their disbelief in brief statements.

"This has to be one of the most unbelievable and horrible things to happen to the U.S. since Pearl Harbor. My hopes and prayers go out to the people who lost their loved ones," said Suffman’s roommate, Corey Lucas was also hit hard by the event. "This is the worst tragedy in the history of the U.S. It’s so unreal. My comfort is just to know how real this really is. For the people, the world, the nation, at a university called Montclair State where I used to go out to everyone. This is the time we should come together." Jessica Oms found the whole experience too incredible to be real.
situation surreal and totally unanticipated.

"It was like it was from the movies. I was watching the news on television and I walked out of Blanton and I saw all the smoke from a distance and it really hit me that it was real."

Several students were so shocked by the situation that they made jokes, out of what may be some of the repercussions stemming from the incident. Others were angered by these jokes as they wiped away their own tears. As she heard one student shouting, "We're all going to die!" in a sarcastic, joking manner, senior Lauren Scott grew enraged. "I'm appalled by some of the students on the campus," she retorted. Everyone had their own way of dealing with the circumstances.

For some students, the situation hit on a much deeper level as they knew of friends and family members who had been working in either of the trade centers or were near the area when the whole thing happened.

Concerned senior Kathy McFadden shared her anger and sorrow. "My best friend works at the World Trade Center and I'm a nervous wreck. I need to call her, but the cell phones are down. I'm very angry and hope the investigation proves to be successful."

Senior Etica Manen knew what she was going through because she too was overwhelmed by fear that relatives were hurt in the occurrence. "I was flipping out," she said. "Now I'm keeping my fingers crossed." Manen's uncle worked in the World Trade Center and was trapped under the collapsed first building, but got out of the second collapse. Manen's two aunts work in D.C. her other aunt lives outside D.C., and her uncle lives on Manhattan's Upper East Side where he is an English professor at a local college.

One student was scared because her friend was in the armed forces. Freshmen Kathy Dolinski stated, "My best friend is in the army and I'm really worried that he is going to sent away."

The reaction is complete and utter shock. In the time of such a terrible attack and such a horrendous tragedy, most of the MSU community can be comforted by the fact that MSU students and staff are coming together to help each other, console each other, and find ways to get through the situation.

Junior Yvonne Krebs felt the only way to help was to pray for the families. "At times like these, the only thing you can find comfort in is prayer. It's important that you pray for the families in this horrendous crisis."

Vice President Chris Fitzpatrick ran around MSU, checking on friends and students, trying to see how he could help, although he was as stunned as everyone else. "I am doing crisis control. The reaction is complete and utter shock. First thing we're gonna do is make sure people in the community are okay and then see what the impact is on a nationwide level."

Fitzpatrick, as well as other SGA board members are spending as much time as possible in their office and will be available for counseling in the coming week. On the day of the attack, they left the SGA office open all day and provided free sandwiches for anyone interested in coming to talk about their reactions.

Junior Yvonne Krebs felt the only way to help was to pray for the families. "At times like these, the only thing you can find comfort in is prayer. It's important that you pray for the families in this horrendous crisis."

I woke up to my mom’s voice. But unlike other mornings, this morning she barged into my room shouting in a panicked voice something I thought I’d never hear. In one single breath she said that one of the Twin Towers was gone and the other was in smoke, the Pentagon was bombed and there were more hijacked planes missing.

The normal lives of every American were thrown into the rest of the world’s problems, and now America realized that there are more serious issues around the world.

This is abnormal for America, but for countries like Israel, Ireland, and many other countries, this is how they live. And we experienced that for the first time yesterday. We now stood not a notch above everyone else - but right in the midst of the world’s pain.

As both watched the bravely, my mom’s body was shaking, mine going cold, the invincible fortress that America thought it was crumbling.

I don’t remember the feeling yesterday of how it felt to be that far away from it. It seemed that my mom blured out the door of thousands of lives. All I felt was a question repeating over my head: why? Now all I feel is anger and disgust for those people who find it necessary to take lives to make a point.

I don’t want to wonder what is it about America that people hate? Is it because we live our lives in peace? Are they jealous? Do they know that we can come to America and live the same life?

Do they hate America for backing Israel? Was it a Palestinian terrorist group? After all September 11 is the one-year anniversary of the Camp David meeting where President Bill Clinton tried to negotiate a peace treaty between the Palestinians and the Israelis. Is it just because America was trying to find a peaceful solution rather than letting the bloodshed continue?

The terrorists made their point as smoke filled up the New York City skyline, and I kept asking myself why someone would do such a thing. Can we, as a nation, answer back? Probably not.

Even if we go to war tomorrow, who takes responsibility for the disaster, is enough?

In a way, we knew that eventually the world would drag us down and show that we do have a vulnerable spot. Eventually someone was going to crack the walls of the fortress.

Instead, it was the airports of America that were cracked.

To have four airliners hijacked from our very own American airports saddens me more. How is it possible to hijack planes in America? What’s all that fancy equipment we go through before boarding an airplane? How can one person, let alone three to five people, get past security with knives? Were the workers there so lazy and negligent to ignore them?

Bottom line: is America’s security system to blame?

Then, to hear that Palestinians are dancing in the streets and giving out candy to celebrate the deaths of what may be over 20,000 innocent lives is even more disturbing. How can someone replace the loss of a life?

As I stood there in front of my TV this morning in disbelief, and as I drove up to campus never having been so mad in my life, I wondered exactly what human nature really is today. Are we that much different from animals?

Are people so hardened that they’d rather kill innocent people instead of sitting down and trying to figure out a peaceful solution? Was never, and I’m sure it goes for many, a big fan of war, but it’s obvious that the only way to make a point is by taking lives for certain people. And for terrorists, sadly, this is how they prefer it.

So now that we have tasted the pain of being part of the world, how can we creep back to being ourselves and not fall apart? How do we recover from the blow reminiscent of Pearl Harbor, a day that has still not been forgotten?

We set an example with the terrorist caught with a truck load of explosives headed for perhaps the George Washington Bridge not far from here on Route 3.

But that depends on our leader, President George W. Bush. Can he make right the wrong of September 11? Certainly not. Nothing can erase the events of these past hours.

What then do I want from our President? I want justice. I want no holds barred, and make it a public event, that those who have been so deeply wounded by these events are allowed the satisfaction of watching justice being carried out.

Let us watch the process unfold live as we watched the smoke and destruction of America this morning.

Under the rubble of what was just two days ago one of the modern wonders of the world, America’s strength must show the same resiliency it did 60 years ago and before.

As for me, today was a day that feels unreal and the images like those from Hollywood movie. But it’s not. It’s a nightmare that came true at the expense of thousands of lives.

PULLING TOGETHER AND MOVING ON

By James DaJison

Editor-In-Chief

It is the purpose of a newspaper of any media outlet to be not just a bank of facts and figures about events, but also a part of the support structure of the community which is its audience. Towards that end, it is my sad task to offer this special edition of The Montclarion to the campus community that it may help to fulfill this role and console in some way those affected by the national tragedy we find ourselves in.

There is nothing I can say here about the tragedy itself that has not already been said. It is not in this publication itself. Then certainly by the many other media organizations covering this disaster and certainly by those who find themselves reading this right now. Words like tragic, unbelievable and inane do not come close to conveying the situation.

All words seem shallow and important at this point. What can be said are a few words regarding how MSU as an institution has so far handled its responsibility to the 13,000 students that attend this school and numerous faculty and staff that run it.

Under normal conditions, the newspaper is often and rightfully the source of criticism directed towards the University. This is part of what helps MSU take steps forward. Today are pointed out that they may be biased. It is then only right that The Montclarion take note of the fault of MSU also.

It is with great pride as part of MSU right now that I find few faults with how MSU has conducted itself thus far in reacting to the tragic events that unfolded yesterday.

With grace and compassion support structures were immediately put in place to assist members of the campus community who needed to get in touch with family and loved ones off campus, or who felt too greatly the burden of this situation and simply needed someone to talk to.

With wisdom, President Cole has left the campus open and functional, as much a symbol of our undaunted courage in the face of disaster as it is a practical and prudent decision. 1,500 residents still need a place to sleep and eat, and countless others are determinedly need the support structure of this institution in place of family that is not ready to hand.

"The University is a bulwark against ignorance and unreason," President Cole says in his letter found in this same publication, and it is by fighting against ignorance and unreason that we will eventually find ourselves in a world where we need not worry about planes flying into buildings on purpose.

To close down, to shut the doors of MSU, would be to let the tenants win, because they will then have achieved their goal. They will have deprived us of our ability to learn and better ourselves, and by doing so deprived us of our ability to fight back.

I encourage everyone to push through this, to fight against these recent acts of violence by continuing the efforts to learn. I feel the urge to take this as an excuse to become lax in your efforts, use it instead as inspiration to propel you towards unthought of heights.

Finally, a word of thanks must be given to those few dedicated members of The Montclarion who sacrificed their day to produce this special edition. All of their talents and sympathies are with those affected by this tragedy.
Disaster in America

September 12, 2001

Good evening.

Today, our fellow citizens, our friends and neighbors came under attack in a series of deliberate and cowardly acts.

Thousands of lives were suddenly ended by evil, despicable acts of terror.

The pictures of airplanes flying into buildings, fires burning, huge structures collapsing, have filled us with disbelief, terrible sadness and a quiet, unyielding anger.

These acts of mass murder were intended to frighten our nation into chaos and retreat. But they have failed. Our country is strong. A great people has been moved to defend a great nation.

Terrorist attacks can shake the foundations of our biggest buildings, but they cannot shake the foundation of America. These acts shatter steel, but they cannot touch the foundation of this great nation.

America was targeted for attack because we're the brightest beacon for freedom and opportunity in the world. And no one will keep that light from shining.

Today, our nation, today, our way of life, our very freedom came under attack. Our military is powerful, and it's prepared. Our emergency teams are working in New York City and Washington, D.C., to help with local rescue efforts.

Our first priority is to get help to those few who may have been injured and to take every precaution to protect our citizens at home and around the world from further attacks.

The functions of our government continue without interruption. Federal agencies in Washington which had to be evacuated today are reopening for essential personnel tonight and will be open for business tomorrow. Our financial institutions remain strong, and the American economy will be open for business as well.

The search is underway for those who are behind these evil acts. I've directed the full resources of our intelligence and law enforcement communities to find those responsible and bring them to justice. We will make no distinction between the terrorist who committed these acts and those who harbor them.

I appreciate so very much the members of Congress who have joined me in immediately following the first attack. I implemented our government's emergency response plans. Our military is powerful, and it's prepared. Our emergency teams are working in New York City and Washington, D.C., to help with local rescue efforts.

Our first priority is to get help to those few who may have been injured and to take every precaution to protect our citizens at home and around the world from further attacks.

The functions of our government continue without interruption. Federal agencies in Washington which had to be evacuated today are reopening for essential personnel tonight and will be open for business tomorrow. 66 AMERICA WAS TARGETED... BECAUSE WE'RE THE BRIGHTEST... BEACON FOR FREEDOM... IN THE WORLD. 99

WE THE PEOPLE OF THE UNITED STATES ARE CRYING OUT FOR JUSTICE. WE WILL NOT COMPLY WITH THE DEMANDS OF THOSE WHO WOULD TAKE OUR FREEDOM FROM US.
Open Letter to Members of the Montclair State University Community:

Tuesday was a dreadful and terrifying day. Here, at the University, the sun was shining and students were going to classes, when suddenly, a few short miles away, the morning was shattered with explosions and massive death and injury. Cut off by the river, we all watched and listened, helpless to do anything, as one explosion after another brought the World Trade Centers down.

Some people in our community were directly and very painfully affected by this tragedy, and all of us grieve for them and for all the victims of these events. In the aftermath, the question uppermost in our minds is what it is that we should do, as individuals and as a University community, to respond. I would suggest these three things that we can help.

First, we must do all we can to help and support those who we may know who have been directly touched by this tragedy.

Second, we can do some practical things to help. For example, we can give blood, we can cooperate in regard to the use of communications and transportation systems, or we can provide housing, food, and transportation to community members who have temporarily been cut off from access to their homes. Vice President Pennington and the Student Development and Campus Life staff will be the central information point for these kinds of practical opportunities to help.

The third thing we can do is far more difficult. We can go about our task of educating ourselves and preparing ourselves to shape a world in which such things do not happen. The tragic acts our country experienced on Tuesday were the product of profound hate and ignorance. When people do not know each other or understand each other, a fertile ground exists for the breeding of hatred. The only effective antidote to hate is knowledge, understanding and a commitment to humanism and humanity.

To see the flames and destruction, to feel the sorrow and tremble in fear is beyond comprehension. But to see children dancing joyfully in the streets in the face of their tragedy and in some ways worse, the children’s joy in the depth of their pain as they perceive as their enemies is the very seed that will grow into the next tragedy of destruction. So our obligation, even in the midst of our grief and our anger, is not to follow the path of revenge. Our obligation is to reconcile ourselves to reality and understand the implications and meaning of the events we witnessed on Tuesday. Our response, as citizens, is to determine how influence as best we can the actions of our government and take it upon to themselves.

Finally, on a less important plan regarding the day, many people have asked why I did not close the University. The more complicated reason relates to what I have said above. The University was closed against the current and unreason, and my feelings suggested that, in the face of such tragedy, it was not a way by which our community should close. The simpler reason for the decision was that there was no danger on the campuses, and I could not see how closing the University would help the situation in any positive way. On the contrary, it seemed to me that by keeping the University running to the fullest possible extent, we would have the ability to attend best to the thousands of students who live on the campus and to the thousands of other commuter students who were already here on campus. In addition, it seemed to me that by trying to meet some of the urgent needs that arose as a result of the event, for example, the care of children on campuses who could not be reached by their parents in New York City, or the needs of students and employees unable to get home, or the psychological needs of students or employees having difficulty coping with the events. Some of our police officers were dispatched to assist New York City at their staging areas, and our ambulance was dispatched to assist at the George Washington Bridge.

Clearly, the events of Tuesday, September 11 will be with us for a long time to come. I would encourage all members of the University to think of ways in which, as an educational community, we can best respond.

Sincerely,
Susan A. Cole, President
